preface to the twentieth edition

The Law of Evidence occupies a unique position in the field of substantive and procedural laws. The existence of substantive rights can only be established by, relevant and admissible evidence. The law of evidence plays a pivotal role in the effective functioning of the judicial system. With rapid advances in diverse fields of life, human relations have undergone an unforeseen transformation, presenting new conflicts and controversies. The law of evidence had to groom itself up for facing the emerging developments which pose unprecedented problems in the collection of evidence and proof of facts. Significant changes have taken place between the publication of the last edition and the present enlarged edition of the time-honoured commentary on the subject by Ratanlal and Dhirajlal. The present edition has had to face the vast ramification of the subject, during the period intervening between the preceding and present edition. Legal pronouncements, scholarly views on the provisions of the Act and on judicial decisions, and statutory amendments reflecting the legislative response to the existing and emerging social challenges have not only developed the subject out of its narrow contours but have given to it new directions. Capturing all the strands of the changing scenario, integrating them into the existing text, examining them from the point of view of their success or failure in the context of the socio-economic and legal problems which brought about the statutory provisions and legal decisions and, shaping the comments accordingly, have been the main tasks that the present edition set before itself. In shaping the comments and reporting the decisions of the period, the traditional style of the book, namely, sorting out the principles in the form of comments on the one hand, and giving the facts and decisions under the heading "Cases", on the other, has been maintained.

In some interesting cases, Courts have had to examine anew whether the statements contained in the First Information Report can be ascribed evidentiary value in an exceptional class of cases. A number of judgments of the Supreme Court have thrown light upon the assessment and appreciation of the testimony of police witnesses, chance witnesses, interested witnesses, child witnesses, so on and so forth. Considerable light has been thrown by decisions of the Supreme Court and the High Court on questions relating to the standard of proof and appreciation of evidence. Clarifications have been provided in a number of judgments on the conflict between ocular, circumstantial and technical evidence. Special rules of evidence are being developed in the appreciation of evidence of victims of sexual assault. The Supreme Court has ruled that such a victim cannot be equated with an accomplice witness. The doctrine of "res gestae" has been elaborated to lend a liberal touch to cases in which the victim is the sole witness. There is also a liberalisation of the view about statements which can be regarded as parts of a transaction. The strict rule of corroboration has been softened and freed from its hackneyed shackles to meet the challenges of new forms of human ingenuity. Significant developments have also taken place in the field of "without prejudice communications". The effect of presumptions in cases of dowry deaths has occupied the minds and concerns of Courts to meet the growing social evil of desperate dimensions. A set of new rules has been devised to deal effectively with cases requiring a person to be subjected to blood test for determining paternity or drunkenness. The scope of the theory of privilege as to documents is being constantly narrowed, one of the latest and thorniest question being whether a Commission of Enquiry can enter upon and decide the question of privilege claimed by the State and its agencies.

This edition notices with care, the explanation of the status of family Courts, the growing recognition of the utility and value of circumstantial evidence, the use of evidence obtained by unlawful means, the extent to which domestic inquiries have to follow the basic principles of law, the extent to which the Supreme Court can interfere with concurrent findings, the expanded meaning of the word "conduct" in reference to persons and parties whose conduct is relevant, the methods of ascertaining the identity of wrongdoers, a new dimension to the meaning of the expression "reasonable ground to believe" in the context of evidence in cases of conspiracies, the accused using in his favour his statements to police which amount to a confession, probative element in the statements as to facts of public nature in Acts and notifications, and acceptance of the opinion of experts on the identity of type-script. The maxim res ipsa loquitur has been explained by the Supreme Court, especially in regard to the scope of its application. The newly created presumptions about suicide by married women and the absence of consent in certain rape cases have had their share of cases explaining the scope of the expressions used in creating these presumptions. The expansion of the varied application of the doctrine of estoppel, which was likely to have crippling effects on the functioning of the Government and educational institutions, has now been subjected to the requirement of the balancing process of equities on both sides.

The total number of cases appearing in our primary reports were taken up and absorbed into the commentary, since every Court ruling has its own value, great or small. This was particularly necessary in the case of a subject like evidence with its procedural overtones. Every case is an example which sub-serves the purpose of assuring that substance is not sacrificed on the altar of procedure. Naturally, therefore, rulings have touched the high figure of more than fifteen thousand. Discussions in judgments on matters of evidence are generally fact-related. Conclusions are drawn pertaining to the subject from which the facts emerge. If the search into case-law can locate a principle, it can then be presented in a concrete shape.

The changes brought about in the Evidence Act by its amendment by the Information Technology Act, have been noted and discussed at appropriate places.

to the twentieth edition (contd.)

Fair trial is the essence of all judicial proceedings. More often than not, it is matters of evidence which prejudice a fair trial. Then, there is an inevitable remand or even retrial. In the application of the various provisions of the Act to a trial process, due attention has been paid to human rights and fair trial.

An extensive subject-index has been provided. Every manner of heading used in the text is reflected in the index. This was necessary for easy search and location of the point under reference in view of the very extensive nature of the commentary.

The Law of Evidence occupies a unique position between substantive and procedural laws. The assertion of Substantive rights can only be established by evidence, relevant and admissible. Therefore, the law of evidence plays a pivotal role in the effective functioning of judicial system. With rapid advances in diverse fields of life, human relationship has undergone an unforseen transformation, presenting new kinds of conflicts and controversies. The effect of presumptions in cases of dowry deaths has occupied the minds and concerns of courts to meet a growing social evil of desperate dimensions. A set of new rules has been devised to deal effectively with cases requiring a person to be subjected to blood test for determining paternity or drunkenness. the frontiers of the doctrine of estoppel have been widened to meet the challenge of novel contentions. The scope of the theory of privilege as to documents is being constantly narrowed, one of the latest and one of the thorniest questions being whether a Commission of Enquiry can enter upon and decide the question of privilege claimed by the State and its agencies.

These and many other developments have been noticed in this edition to enrich the text of the commentaries.

Y.V. CHANDRACHUD
CHIEF EDITOR

preface to the eighteenth edition

Appearing, as it does, five years after the preceding edition, the present edition has had to face and harness the vast growth of the subject during the period. Legal pronouncements, in the shape of a large body of case-law, scholarly views on the provisions of the Act and also on judicial decisions under those provisions and statutory amendments showing legislative responses to the existing and emerging social problems have not only developed the subject out of its existing bounds but also imparted to it certain new trends and directions. Capturing all the strands of the changing scenario, integrating them into the existing text, examining them from the point of view of their success or failure in the context of the socio-economic and legal problems which brough about the statutory provisions and legal decisions and shaping the comments accordingly have been the main tasks that the present edition set before itself. In shaping the comments and reporting the decisions of the period, the traditional style of the book, namely, sorting out the principles in the form of comments, on the one hand, and giving the facts and decisions under the heading "Cases", on the other, has been maintained.

This edition witnesses the explanation of the status of family courts; the growing recognition of the utility and value of circumstantial evidence, rethinking about the appreciation of the evidence of victims of sexual assault; the use of evidence obtained by unlawful means; the extent to which domestic inquiries have to follow the principles of this subject; the extent to which the Supreme Court can interfere in concurrent findings; a liberalisation of the view about statements which can be regarded as parts of the transaction, (res gestae); the expanded meaning of the word "conduct" in reference to persons and parties whose conduct is relevant; the methods of ascertaining the identity of wrongdoers; a new dimension to the meaning of the expression "reasonable ground to believe" in the context of evidence in cases of conspiracies; expansion of the scope of the expression "without prejudice negotiations"; the accused using in his favour his statements to police which amount to confession; viewing the dying declarations of women sacrificed at the altar of dowry; probative element in the statements as to facts of public nature in Acts and notifications, and acceptance of the opinion of experts about the identity of type- script. These developments have been recorded in the field of relevancy of facts.

In reference to the scope of the expression "direct evidence" computerised information and videotaping of a happening have been taken out of the "hearsay" exclusion, but not newspaper reports of similar happenings. In the matters of burden of proof, the matters relating to election petitions and "alibi" pleas have attracted comments from the Supreme Court. The maxim res ipsa loquitur has also invited Supreme Court comments as to the scope of its application. The newly created presumptions about suicide by married women and absence of consent in certain rape cases have had their share of cases explaining the scope of the expressions used in creating these presumptions. The rapid expansion of the varied applications of the doctrine of estoppel, which were likely to have crippling effects on the functioning of the Government and educational institutions, the same has now been subjected to the requirement of the balancing process of equities on both sides.

The extent of police privilege in not disclosing their sources of information, and the legal professional privilege and how it becomes affected if a privileged document happens to fall in the hands of a third person, have been examined anew in the light of demands of public interest.

COMMENTS

"The Law of Evidence is the system of rules and standards by which the admission of proof at the trial of a lawsuit is regulated."[2]

"Law of Evidence is not about determining the consequences of facts but about establishing those facts."[3]

1. HISTORY OF THE LAW OF EVIDENCE IN INDIA

In India there was no uniform law on the subject of evidence prior to the passing of the Indian Evidence Act (1 of 1872). Before the advent of the British Rule in India, during the Mohammedan rule, a practice had grown to follow some rules of evidence on the basis of customs and usages of Muslims. For sometime even after the British started ruling the country, the same rules of Mohammedan Law continued. The British rulers, though they did not have any codified or consolidated law of evidence in their country, thought fit to frame some rules to be followed by the courts in India. By that time the courts in the Presidency towns in India, which were established by Royal Charter, were following the English rules of evidence subject to some modifications made by certain Acts. But in the muffassil area, the English rules of Evidence did not prevail and the courts were following Mohammedan rules of evidence especially in criminal cases. As some English Judges were presiding over the courts even in muffassil area, they used to follow the rules of evidence of their country as their guide.

For the first time, the Evidence Act II of 1855 prescribed some rules of evidence to be followed in our country, but Section 58 thereof stated that 'Nothing contained in this Act shall be so construed as to render inadmissible in any court which, but for the passing of this Act, would have been admissible in such court. That Act of 1855 did not prohibit the adoption of rules of English system or the rules of Mohammedan Law established by practice or custom that was followed in the courts.

After taking note of several comments made by the judges working in India, a Draft Bill was prepared and introduced in the Legislative Council by Mr. Maine (later Sir Henry Sumner Maine) who was then the Law Member of the Legislative Council. The Draft Bill was prepared basing on the report of the Commissioners, which was presented in 1868 to Her Majesty, in which it is stated as follows: "India does not at present possess a uniform law upon this subject. Within the Presidency towns, the English Law of Evidence is in force modified by certain Acts of the Indian Legislature, of which Act 2 of 1855 is the most important; this Act contains many valuable provisions. It extends the range of judicial notice and facilitates the proof of documents, of foreign system of law and of matters of public history.....The Act however bears difference in many cases to the existing law and it appears to have been designed, not as a complete body of rules, but as supplementary to and corrective of the English Law, and also of the customary law of evidence prevailing in those parts of British India, where English Law is not administered. This customary Law has not assumed any definite form; the Mohammedan Law, since the enactment of the new Code of Criminal Procedure, has ceased to have any validity in the country courts, even in criminal matters; and those courts have, in fact, no fixed rules of evidence except those contained in Act 2 of 1855. They are not required to follow the English Law as such, although they are not debarred from following it where they regard it as the most equitable..... In a country like India where the task of judicial investigation is attended with peculiar difficulties and where it is the duty of the judge in all civil and criminal cases to decide without a jury, there is a greater danger of miscarriage from the mind of the court, being uninformed, than from it's being unduly influenced by the information laid before it. It seems therefore better to afford every facility for the admission of truth although with some risk that falsehood or error may be mixed up with it than to narrow, with a view to the exclusion of falsehood, the channels by which truth is admitted." (Arbuthnot's Select Reports (Preface, page 27). The Draft was referred to the Select Committee of the Legislative Council. The Select Committee, in its findings, stated that it was not sufficiently elementary for the officers for whose use it was designed and that it assumed an acquaintance on their part with the law of England which could scarcely be expected from them. Thus it held the opinion that it was not suitable to the conditions in India.[4]

Later, a Draft Bill based on the two reports submitted by the Select Committee was prepared under the Chairmanship of Mr. Stephen and was introduced by Mr. Stephen who succeeded Mr. Maine in the Legislative Council. In his speech in the proceedings of the Legislative Council on 18th April, 1871 he stated, "It would be exceedingly difficult to say precisely what, at the present moment, the law upon the subject certainly is. To some extent, it is far from being clear to what extent and in some parts of the country—though questions might be raised as to the particular parts of the country—the English Law of Evidence appears to be in force in British India. Whatever may be the theory, it both is and will continue to be so in practice; for if the English Law of Evidence has not been introduced into the country English lawyers and quasi-lawyers have decided; and they have been deciding according to the law of justice, equity, and good conscience. Practically speaking, these attractive words mean little more than an imperfect understanding of imperfect collections of not very recent editions of English text books. It is difficult to imagine anything much less satisfactory than such a state of the Law as this. A good deal may be said for an elaborate legal system, well understood and strictly administered; a good deal may be said for unaided motherwit and natural shrewdness; but a half and half system, in which a vast body of half understood Law, totally destitute of arrangement and of uncertain authority, maintains a dead alive existence, is a state of things which it is by no means easy to praise."

After getting the approval of the Legislative Council and receiving the assent of the Governor-General in India on the 15th of March, 1872, it became law as "The Indian Evidence Act". Mr. Stephen (later Sir James Stephen) wrote in Chapter 2 of his book "Indian Evidence Act" as follows: "Every Judicial proceeding, whatever, has for its purpose the ascertaining of some right or liability. If the proceeding is criminal, the object is to ascertain the liability to punishment of the person accused; if the proceeding is civil, the object is to ascertain some right of property or of status or the right of one party and the liability of the other, to some form of relief. All rights and liabilities are dependent upon and arise out of facts, and facts, fall into two clauses, those which can, and those which cannot be perceived by the senses. Of facts which can be perceived by the senses, it is superfluous to give example. Of facts which cannot be perceived by the senses, intention, fraud, good faith, and knowledge may be given as examples. But each class of facts has in common, one element which entitles them to the name of facts; they can be directly perceived either with or without the intervention of the senses. A man can testify to the fact that, at a certain time, he had a certain intention on the same ground as that on which he can testify that, at a certain time and place, he saw a particular man. He has in each case a present recollection of a past direct perception."

2. OBJECTS AND REASONS

The Law of Evidence is the most important branch of adjectival law. It is to legal practice what logic is to all reasoning. Without it, trials might be infinitely prolonged to the great detriment of the public and the vexation and expense of suitors. It is by this that the Judge separates the wheat from the chaff among the mass of facts that are brought before him, decides upon their just and mutual bearing, learns to draw correct inferences from circumstances, and to weigh the value of direct testimony. It is by this guide that he is able to tread his way with comparative safety among the burning ploughshares of perjury, forgery and fraud that beset his footsteps, and to rest his judgment on a basis of probabilities at least comparatively satisfactory to his own mind. (Norton)

The Indian Evidence Act has codified the rules of English law of evidence with such modification as are rendered necessary by the peculiar circumstances of this country. But the Act is not exhaustive, and cases do arise for the solution of which principles of common law are resorted to. The Code, though chiefly drawn upon the lines of the English law of evidence, was not intended to be a servile copy of it.

The object of codification is that, on any point specifically dealt with by an Act, the law should be ascertained by interpreting its language, instead of, as before, roaming over a vast number of authorities to discover what the law is, and extracting it by a critical examination of the prior decisions.[5]

One great object of the Evidence Act was to prevent laxity in the admissibility of evidence, and to introduce a correct and uniform rule of practice that was previously in vogue. The Evidence Act is not intended to do more than prescribe rules for the admissibility or otherwise of evidence on the issues as to which the Courts have to record findings.

The main principles which underlie the law of evidence are:

(1) evidence must be confined to the matters in issue;

(2) hearsay evidence must not be admitted; and

(3) the best evidence must be given in all cases.

The object in adducing evidence is to find out the truth or otherwise of the disputed facts over all points in issue, and that no evidence is adduced which is not relevant to the issue, though evidence of collateral facts is admissible.[6]

3. WHETHER CAN BE AN AID TO CONSTRUCTION OF THE STATUTE

It is pointed out by the Supreme Court[7] that the statement of object and reasons for enacting a law is not admissible as an aid to the construction of the statute and it cannot even control the meaning of the words used in the Act. But it can be referred to for a limited purpose of knowing the circumstances and the purpose in sponsoring the Bill. It can be looked into as to what the Legislature intended to achieve.[8] When the provisions of the Act leave no room to doubt what was meant by the Legislature, it is not even relevant to consider.[9] As the Bill might have undergone some changes in the Legislature, there will not be any guarantee that the reasons and the objects which were sought to be achieved have remained the same before it came into being as an Act. So it was held that objects and reasons of the Bill cannot be an aid to the construction of the statute.[10] A reference may be had for a limited purpose to find out the prevailing conditions and circumstances at the time of introduction of the Bill, and the extent and urgency of evil which the Bill sought to remedy.[11]

4. PREAMBLE, OBJECT AND ITS ROLE IN CONSTRUCTION

The object of the preamble of an Act is to indicate what[12], in general terms, was the object of the Legislature in passing the Act.[13]

The preamble can be looked at, to solve any ambiguity or to fix the meaning of the word which may have more than one meaning, or to keep the effect of the Act within its real scope wherever the enacting part is open to doubt in any respect.[14] It may give useful assistance as to what the statute intends to reach but when it is clear and unambiguous the preamble cannot vary its meaning.[15] It cannot be looked into, to create an ambiguity.[16] It cannot either restrict or extend the enacting part, where the language and object and scope are not open to any doubt.[17] The enacting part prevails over the preamble where there is conflict between the two.[18] The Supreme Court has pointed out that the policy and the purpose of a given Act may be deduced from the long title and preamble thereof.[19] The Supreme Court held that the Court cannot start with a preamble for construing the provisions of an Act, though it would be justified in resorting to it if it finds that the language used by Parliament is ambiguous or is too general, though in point of fact Parliament intended that it should have a limited application.[20] It is one of the cardinal principles of construction that when the language of the Act, is clear the preamble must be disregarded. Where the object or meaning of an Act is not clear it may be resorted to, to explain it.[21]

While the preamble gives the purpose and object of an Act, it does not give any specific purpose of any particular section in the Act.

5. CONSOLIDATING ACT

The preamble here shows that the Indian Evidence Act is not merely a fragmentary enactment, but a consolidating one. The reasons and object of consolidation are to see that differences in practice adopted till then by different courts while admitting evidence are avoided and certain guidelines are given for admitting the evidence relating to different issues in a given case. Secondly, if such consolidation is done by a codified enactment, such law alone should be sought for interpreting the language therein and it would help avoiding critical examination of a number of authors to make out what the law was on a particular given point.[22]

As this Act is expected to be the whole law or complete code applicable in India, the principles of equity, justice and good conscience cannot be drawn by the Judge relying on the principles of law in England. Accordingly, a judge cannot allow evidence which is inadmissible under the provisions of this Act, even if he feels that such inadmissible evidence throws some light on the issue.[23] Once a statute is passed, which purports to contain the whole law of evidence applicable in India. It is not open to any judge to exercise a dispensing power, and admit evidence not admissible by the statute, because it appears to him that the irregular evidence would throw light upon the issue. The principles of exclusion of evidence adopted by the Act must be applied strictly and cannot be relaxed at the discretion of the Court.[24]

The Act reduces the English law of evidence to the form of express propositions arranged in their natural order with some modifications rendered necessary by the peculiar circumstances of India. It is, in the main, drawn on the lines of the English law of evidence.

SUBBARAO J. observed: "It has been acknowledged generally, with some exceptions, that the Indian Evidence Act was intended to and did in fact consolidate the English law of Evidence. In case of doubt or ambiguity over the interpretation of any of the sections of the Evidence Act, the Court can with profit look to the relevant English Common Law for ascertaining their true meaning.[25] Prior to the above decision it was held, while interpreting Section 92 of the Act, that English cases do not control the Indian Statute and however useful they may be for understanding the law on which the statute is based, they are scarcely direct authority regarding its construction on which alone must depend the decision in a case governed by the Statute.[26] But if there had been legislation within the jurisdiction of the Privy Council and the House of Lords in England, using the same or similar expressions as in the Indian enactment the guidance afforded by such English decisions would indeed be valuable.[27]

The Indian Evidence Act is not exhaustive of the rules of Evidence.[28] The Evidence Act deals with the subject of Law of Evidence in general; there are other rules of evidence contained in other enactments. Thus the whole Law of Evidence is contained in the Evidence Act as well as in those Statutes, Acts and Regulations which are not expressly repealed by this Act. The Law of Evidence which is a complete Code does not permit the importation of any principle of English Common Law relating to evidence in criminal cases to the contrary.[29]

6. PRINCIPLES OF INTERPRETATION

It was pointed out by LORD HERSCHELL that the natural meaning, uninfluenced by any considerations derived from the previous state of law, has to be looked at and that one should not start enquiring how the previous law stood. The Court would be justified if it looks into the history of the legislation, not for purpose of construing the provisions of the Act, but for a limited purpose to know the condition and circumstances in passing the enactment and the mischief to be prevented, and the remedy for the same.[30]

JUSTICE KRISHNA IYER observed: "Legislative history within circumspect limits may be consulted by courts to resolve ambiguities. While understanding and interpreting a statute, the roots of the past, the foliage of the present and the seeds of the future must be within the ken of the activist judge..... Courts must search for a reliable scientific method of discovery rather than the speculative quest, for the spirit of the statute, and the cross-thoughts from legislator's lips or law commissioners pens..... The words of a statute must be understood in the sense which the Legislature has in view, and their meaning must be found not so much in strictly grammatical or etymological propriety of language, nor in its popular use. The words cannot be read in isolation; their colour and content are derived from their context and therefore, every word must be examined in its context.[31]

A word of every day use must be construed in its popular sense.[32]

If the provisions are unambiguous and clear, one should not have recourse to the pre-existing law, although it may be useful and legitimate when the provisions are doubtful and couched in a language which had previously acquired a technical meaning.[33] Consideration arising out of legislative history cannot be allowed to override the plain words of a statute.[34] If a particular section or a word has received judicial construction and if it is re-enacted or re-used, then such re-enactment may be treated as legislative recognition of the construction given by the judicial pronouncement unless there is something to rebut the same.[35] A statute is an authentic repository of the Legislative will, and the function of the Court is only to interpret according to the intent of the Legislature that made it.[36] No words should be considered as redundant or surplus in interpreting a rule or a statute.[37]

It is a matter of judicial prudence to decide an issue under a specific statute by confining the focus to that statutory compass as far as possible. Any derivation into wider jurisprudential areas is fraught with unwitting conflict and confusion.[38] A statute must be read as a whole and every provision must be construed with reference to the context and other clauses as far as possible to make it consistent.[39]

The Law of Evidence is a law of procedure and it would not affect substantive rights. The Law relating to procedure, when amended, operates retrospectively, unless it creates new disabilities or obligations or imposes new duties, in which case it is to be treated as prospective.[40]

7. REPEAL

The provisions of Section 6 of the General Clauses Act, would apply only when the statute or regulation having the force of statute is actually repealed and it would not apply to any enactment which is of temporary nature which automatically expires by efflux of time.[41]

PART I

RELEVANCY OF FACTS

CHAPTER I

PRELIMINARY

Short title.

S. 1. This Act may be called the Indian Evidence Act, 1872.

Extent.

It extends to the whole of India except the State of Jammu and Kashmir and applies to all judicial proceedings in or before any Court, including Courts-martial, other than Courts-martial convened under the Army Act, the Naval Discipline Act or the Indian Navy (Discipline) Act, 1934, or the Air Force Act but not to affidavits presented to any Court or Officer, nor to proceedings before an arbitrator;

Commencement of Act.

And it shall come into force on the first day of September, 1872.

COMMENTS

1. TERRITORIAL JURISDICTION

This Act extends to the whole of India except the State of Jammu and Kashmir. The word 'Whole of India' was substituted in 1950, for the words 'all the provinces of India', which was substituted in 1948 for the words 'The Whole of British India'. Under the Indian Constitution, India consists of territories specified in the First Schedule and also such other territories as may be acquired. The Act applies to the whole of India excluding the State of Jammu and Kashmir (vide definition of 'India' under Section 3). Jammu and Kashmir is governed by a separate Evidence Act [(13 of 1977) Samrat] on the same lines as this Act.

2. APPLICABILITY OF THE ACT

This Act applies to all judicial proceedings in or before any Court including Courts-Martial other than Courts-Martial convened under the Army Act, the Naval Discipline Act, the Indian Navy Discipline Act and the Air Force Act. This Act does not apply to affidavits presented to any Court or Officer and to proceedings before arbitrators. The Evidence Act has no application to enquiries by Tribunals, even though they may be judicial in character. The law only requires that rules of natural justice should be observed in the conduct of enquiries and if they do so the decisions of Tribunals are not liable to be impeached.[1]

The Law of Evidence is the lex fori which governs the Courts. Whether a witness is competent or not; whether a certain matter requires to be proved by writing or not; whether certain evidence proves a certain fact or not; that is to be determined by the law of the country where the question arises, where the remedy is sought to be enforced, and where the Court sits to enforce it.[2] The Law of Evidence is a part of the law of procedure.

3. JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS

The words 'Judicial Proceedings' is not defined in this Act, but under Section 2(1) of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1973, it includes any proceedings in the course of which evidence is or may be legally taken on oath.

An enquiry is judicial if its object is to determine jural relation between one person and another or a group of persons, or between him and the community generally.[3] But even a judge acting without such an object in view, is not acting judicially. An enquiry in which evidence is legally taken is included in the term judicial proceeding.[4] One should keep in mind the distinction, though thin, between judicial proceedings and administrative proceedings. An inquiry about matters of fact, where there is no discretion to be exercised and no judgement to be formed but something is to be done in a certain event as a duty, is not a judicial but an administrative inquiry.

4. PROCEEDINGS NOT JUDICIAL

The following proceedings have been held to be not judicial:—

(a) Proceedings before a Magistrate not authorised to conduct any enquiry.[5]

(b) An inquest proceeding before the Coroners under Coroners's Act, 1871.[6]

Coroners are Magistrates in view of Section 20, for purposes of Sections 18, 21 and 26 of this Act and are entitled to administer oath and take evidence but they cannot give any definite judgement.[7]

(c) An enquiry by a District Magistrate into a crime alleged[8], delivery of possession by Nazir.[9]

(d) An enquiry under Section 476 (New Section 340) Cr.P.C.[10] see CONTRA in.[11]

(e) An enquiry under Section 176 Cr.P.C.[12]

(f) Domestic Tribunals—Departmental Proceedings.—In enquiries before tribunals or in departmental proceedings, strict rules of evidence may not apply because usually the enquiring officers consist of persons not having acquaintance with the rules of evidence. Even though the Evidence Act is not applicable in certain cases, the principles of natural justice should be observed. In a case relating to the powers of a Local Government Board under the Housing and Town Planning Act of 1909, which came up for hearing in the case of King v. Local Government Board Ex-parte Arlidge Rice,[13] it was held that the procedure indicated by the rules under the statute was followed and there was no obligation on the Board to hear the appellant either personally or through his representative or counsel as there was no provision in the statute. When the matter was taken in appeal in Rex v. Local Government Board Ex-parte Arlidge[14], the appeal was allowed by a majority judgement (HAMILTON L.J. dissenting) stating that the Local Board should not have dismissed the appeal without giving the appellant an opportunity of being heard in support of the appeal, they quashed the order of the Local Board dismissing the original appeal. It was further held that the owner of the property who was the appellant before the Local Board was entitled to a hearing as he had no opportunity of seeing and considering the report of the officers concerned and the documents which the Local Board had before it.

The judges who gave the majority judgment followed the dictum of LORD BURN L.C. in Board of Education v. Rice[15] wherein it was stated that the Board must act 'in good faith and fairly listen to both sides'. Against the majority opinion the Local Board went in appeal to the House of Lords in Local Board v. Arlidge[16]. VISCOUNT HALDANE observed: "When the duty of deciding an appeal is imposed, those whose duty it is to decide must act judicially. They may deal with the question referred to them without bias, and they must give to each of the parties the opportunity of adequately presenting the case made. The decision must be in the spirit and with the sense of responsibility of a tribunal whose duty it is to mete out justice. But it does not follow that the procedure of every such tribunal must be the same."

LORD SHAW observed: "Insofar as the term 'Natural Justice' means that a result of process should be just, it is harmless though it may be a high sounding expression; insofar as it attempts to reflect the old JUS NATURALE, it is a confused and unwarranted transfer into the ethical sphere of a term employed for other distinctions."

In another case also[17], VISCOUNT SIMON and LORD ATKIN observed that Lord Loreburn's dictum in Board of Education v. Rice affords a complete guide for the application of the principle.

In our country so far as domestic tribunals and departmental enquiries are concerned, time and again, it was observed by the Supreme Court that though such enquiries are not governed by strict rules of evidence and this Act is not made applicable, the ordinary principles of proof and the rules of natural justice have to be applied.[18]

Some of the cases on such proceedings are :

Disciplinary Proceedings Tribunal.[21]

Though the Tribunal need not strictly follow the provisions of the Evidence Act, it must in all cases follow the principles of natural justice and should avoid hearsay evidence, because, oral evidence of a witness will have value only when he can be held responsible for its truth by cross-examination by the opposite party; secondly, hearsay evidence has no prima facie assurance of truth and thirdly, avoidance of hearsay evidence is not merely a technical rule under the Evidence Act but it is a rule of natural justice.[22] (See also Notes under "Court" in Section 3).

The Supreme Court observed, "In a domestic enquiry all the strict and sophisticated rules of this Act may not apply. All materials which are logically probative for a prudent mind are permissible though departmental authorities and administrative tribunals must be careful in evaluating such material and shall not glibly swallow what is strictly speaking not relevant under the Evidence Act. judicial approach is objective exclusion of extraneous materials or consideration and observance of rules of natural justice. Fair play is the basis and if perversity or arbitrariness, bias or surrender of independence of judgement, vitiate the conclusion reached, such a finding even of a domestic tribunal cannot be held to be good. The simple point in all these is whether there was some evidence or there was no evidence, not in the sense of the technical rules governing court proceedings, but in a fair common sense way as men of understanding and worldly wisdom will accept. Sufficiency of evidence in proof of the finding by a domestic tribunal is beyond scrutiny by court while absence of any evidence in support of the finding is an error of law apparent on the record and the Court can interfere with the finding".

5. CONTEMPT PROCEEDINGS

Though the proceedings relating to contempt of Court are judicial in character, they are outside the scope of this Act.[36] It was held that the power of the High Court to take proceedings for contempt and punish the contemner is a special jurisdiction which is inherent in all Courts of record, that the Criminal

Procedure Code does not apply in the matter of contempt triable by a High Court as it can deal with contempt summarily and adopt its own procedure, that all that is required is that the procedure should be fair and the contemner should be made aware of the charge against him and he should be given a reasonable opportunity to defend himself.[37]

Usually proceedings under the Contempt of Courts Act are decided on the basis of affidavits. It is observed in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND (Vol. VIII, para 67): "It is therefore not true to say that contempt must be proved in the manner laid down in the Evidence Act; the Court undoubtedly has to satisfy itself that contempt has been committed, but is competent to adopt its own procedure for deriving satisfaction." But one has to see that the principles of natural justice are observed. The contemner must be made aware of the charge levelled against him and must be given an opportunity to defend himself.

Court.—The word includes judges and magistrates and all persons except arbitrators legally authorised to take evidence (vide Section 3).

6. AFFIDAVIT

This section specifically states that this Act is not applicable to affidavits. Affidavit means a statement or a declaration in writing on oath or affirmation before a person having authority to administer an oath or affirmation. It has already been pointed out that in contempt proceedings the hearing would normally take place based on the affidavits filed before the Courts. In any judicial proceeding, oral evidence will be taken in the presence of the opposite party who will have the right of cross-examination. But in the case of an affidavit the opposite party will not have an opportunity to cross-examine the deponent of the affidavit. In this Act the definition of the word 'Evidence' in Section 3 does not mention an affidavit, for it is specifically excluded by this section. Therefore, an affidavit cannot be taken as evidence except as provided in Order 19, C.P.C. Order 19, Rule (1) C.P.C. states that any Court may at any time for sufficient reason order that any particular fact or facts may be proved by affidavit or that the affidavit of any witnesses may be read at the hearing on such conditions as the Court thinks reasonable; provided that, where it appears to the court that either party bona fide desires the production of a witness for cross-examination and such witness can be produced, an order shall not be made authorising the evidence of such witness to be given by affidavit. Affidavits cannot be taken as evidence unless permitted under Order 19, Rule 1 or 2, C.P.C.[38]

When affidavits are allowed to be filed one has to take note of the provisions of Order 19, Rule 3, CPC, where it is stated that every affidavit should carefully express how much of the statement is within the deponent's knowledge and how much of it is of his belief. And if some statements are given on belief, the grounds of such belief have to be stated. In State v. Purushotham,[39] it was held that when facts stated in the affidavit are not based on personal knowledge but based on belief the source of information should be clearly disclosed.[40]

A declaration in the shape of an affidavit cannot be received as evidence of the facts stated in it.[41] It is open to the Court to consider the facts alleged in the affidavit, if not controverted by any counter affidavit.[42] An affidavit can be taken as evidence if it is so ordered by the Court.[43] If the deponent dies before he is examined, it can be taken as a statement in writing of a dead man under Section 32 of this Act. If the person who gave the affidavit is not produced for cross-examination, the Court cannot take it as evidence.[44] An affidavit can be used as evidence if parties agree to treat it as evidence.[45] As an exception to the general rule, affidavits can be used in contempt proceedings as they are usually decided on the basis of affidavits.[46]

The Madras High Court has held that an affidavit given by an employee of the Railways cannot be used as substantive evidence but can be used as an admission on the part of the Railway Administration.[47] Affidavits can be taken as evidence where a specific provision of an Act provides that a certain matter be supported by an affidavit.[48] Section 16A(7) of U.P. Intermediate Education Act makes provision for receiving affidavits as evidence in enquiries.[49] Section 45 of the Divorce Act provides for the Court to allow affidavit evidence but the deponents have to be present for cross-examination, if directed by the Court.[50] Section 30 of the Arbitration Act enables the Court to decide the question on affidavits and other evidence if the Court so directs.[51]

In the case of affidavit sworn in Foreign Countries, one has to prove the identity and the signature of the person swearing to the affidavit.[52] Reference to a Civil Court under Section 146(1) Cr.P.C. shows that the Civil Court has jurisdiction and is legally competent to require the person whose affidavit was filed before the Magistrate u/s. 145(1) Cr.P.C. to attend the Court for the purpose of cross-examination, though it is discretionary. Therefore, 'evidence' here includes, affidavit.[53]

7. PROCEEDINGS BEFORE ARBITRATOR

The Act is not applicable to proceedings before arbitrators as they have no powers to administer the oath and need not examine witnesses. But they should conform to the rules of natural justice and are unfettered by technical rules of evidence.[54] An award cannot be set a side on the ground that rules of evidence were not followed.[55]

As far as possible and practicable, rules of evidence must be followed by the arbitrator and he must not admit inadmissible evidence.[56] Evidence given in the previous infructuous arbitration proceedings can be accepted in proceedings.[57] Arbitrator honestly admitting inadmissible evidence, is not guilty of mis-conduct.[58]

But nothing herein contained shall be deemed to affect any provision of any Statute, Act or Regulation in force in any part of British India and not hereby expressly repealed."

Some of the provisions relating to evidence contained in other enactments may be noted: Order 26, CPC relating to reports of commissioners appointed by the Court for local inspection or to examine accounts etc., special rules regarding medical witnesses who are not called as witness (Section 291, Cr.P.C.), reports of scientific experts (Section 293, Cr.P.C.), certificates of Jail Officers, certified orders of previous convictions etc., under Criminal Procedure Code; rules contained in Sections 59 and 123 of the Transfer of Property Act regarding execution and attestation of mortgages and gifts respectively, inadmissibility of certain documents not duly stamped under Section 35 of the Indian Stamp Act, admissibility of certain documents as per Sections 17, 49, 50 of the Indian Registration Act and rules in Bankers Books Evidence Act.

It can be seen that certain provisions relating to evidence contained in other enactments are saved. As the section as it originally stood was repealed it does not have the effect of bringing back the old rules which were repealed.[59] Section 8 of the Repealing Act of 1938 specifically saves the saving clause under the old Section 2 of the original Act.

Section 7 reads. "(1)In any (Central Act) or Regulation made after the commencement of this Act, it shall be necessary, for the purpose of reviving, either wholly or partially, any enactment wholly or partially repealed, expressly to state that purpose.

(2) This section applies also to all Central Acts made after the third of January, 1868, and to all Regulations made on or after the fourteenth day of January, 1897."

Interpretation clause.

S. 3 In this Act the following words and expressions are used in the following senses, unless a contrary intention appears from the context:—

"Court".

"Court" includes all Judges and Magistrates, and all persons, except arbitrators, legally authorised to take evidence.

"Fact".

"Fact" means and includes—

(1) any thing, state of things, or relation of things, capable of being perceived by the senses;

(2) any mental condition of which any person is conscious.

(a) That there are certain objects arranged in a certain order in a certain place, is a fact.

(b) That a man heard or saw something, is a fact.

(c) That a man said certain words, is a fact.

(d) That a man holds a certain opinion, has a certain intention, acts in good faith or fraudulently, or uses a particular word in a particular sense, or is or was at a specified time conscious of a particular sensation, is a fact.

(e) That a man has a certain reputation, is a fact.

"Relevant".

One fact is said to be relevant to another when the one is connected with the other in any of the ways referred to in the provisions of this Act relating to the relevancy of facts.

"Facts in issue".

The expression "facts in issue" means and includes—any fact from which, either by itself or in connection with other facts, the existence, non-existence, nature or extent of any right, liability, or disability, asserted or denied in any suit or proceeding, necessarily follows.

COMMENTS

1. INSERTION OF A NEW CLAUSE TO SECTION 3

At the foot of Section 3, a new clause has been inserted by the Information Technology Act, 2000 which says that the expressions "Certifying Authority", "digital signature", "Digital Signature Certificate", "electronic form", "electronic records", "information", "secure electronic record", "secure digital signature" and "subscriber" shall have the same meanings as the said Act, 2000 assigns to them respectively.

2. INTERPRETATION CLAUSE

In this section certain words like Court, Fact, Relevant, Facts in issue, Document, Evidence, Proved, Disproved, Not proved and India, are defined subject to the qualification "Unless a contrary intention appears from the context". One would find generally in all statutes qualifying words like "Unless the context otherwise requires" or "Unless a contrary intention appears". The Supreme Court in V.F.&G. Insurance Co., v. Fraser Ross,[1] stated that in view of this qualification the Court has not only to look at the words but also look at the context and object of such words relating to such matters and then interpret the meaning that was intended to be conveyed by the use of the words under the circumstances. All statutory definitions must be read subject to this qualification, even though the definition clause does not contain those qualifying words. Where those qualifying words are absent, little weight is to be attached to such absence, as some such words of qualification are to be implied.[2] CRAIES observes: "Another important rule with regard to the effect of an interpretation clause is that an interpretation clause is not to be taken as substituting one set of words for another or as strictly defining what the meaning of a term must be under all circumstances, but rather as declaring what may be comprehended within the term where the circumstances require that it should be so comprehended.[3] MAXWELL observes: "It is common for a statute to contain a provision that certain words and phrases shall, when used in the statute, bear a particular meaning. Sometimes, it is provided that a word shall 'mean' what the definition section says it shall mean; in this case, the word is restricted to the scope indicated in the definition section. Sometimes, however, the word 'include' is used in order to enlarge the meaning of words or phrases occurring in the body of the statute; and when it is so used, words or phrases must be construed as comprehending not only such things as they signify according to their natural import, but also those things which the interpretation clause declares that they shall include. In other words, the word in respect of which 'includes' is used, bears both its extended statutory meaning and its ordinary, popular and natural sense whenever that would be properly applicable. A provision defining the meaning of a word in a statute does not necessarily govern that word when it appears in regulations made under the statute".[4]

3. "COURT"

The word 'Court' is defined to include all judges and magistrates and all persons except arbitrators legally authorised to take evidence. The expression "include", would show that the Act is not meant to be exhaustive.[5] The Supreme Court has[6] held that the definition is necessarily not exhaustive but is framed only for the purposes of the Act, and as such cannot be extended where such extension is not warranted.[7]

Originally in England the word 'Court' meant the King's palace. Later it was given the meaning that a person or persons who administers justice and also a place where justice was administered. In the present Act the definition was framed only for the purpose of the Act and should not be extended beyond its legitimate scope and no exception to the rule should be permitted. WEST C.J. observed; "It is the object to which an enquiry before a Judge is directed which determines the nature of it; that an enquiry is judicial if the object of it is to determine a jural relation between one person and another or a group of persons or between a person and the community generally".[8] In order to be a Court, the person or persons who may be said to constitute it must be entrusted with judicial functions, which means deciding litigated questions according to certain rules of procedure prescribed by law and not arbitrarily but on evidence. With impartiality and fairness and it should be done normally in public and in the presence of both the parties concerned.[9]

According to the test propounded by the decision in[10], there must be a lis before the officer enquiring into the matter. But, according to SUNDARA AYYAR. J. of the Madras High Court, it is not always necessary to have a litigated question among the parties before the court. He gave an example in support of his observation stating that if the guardian of an infant, or a trustee makes an application before a court, for leave to sell certain properties of the ward or the beneficiary, there might have not be any respondent in the application; yet it cannot be doubted that the order passed would be that of a court. The learned Judge further added that a court must be armed with certain powers under the sanctions of law, like power to enforce attendance of witnesses, production of document, receiving evidence on the questions to be decided, to pronounce judgement with a power to enforce it between the parties. According to him a court must not only be empowered with judicial functions but must also be invested with judicial powers, and if a tribunal satisfies the above tests, though not exhaustive, it would be difficult to hold that it is not a court. In that case the learned Judge, repelling the contention that the Indian Legislature (then Governor General-in-Council) has power to create new Courts of Justice or limit the jurisdiction of existing courts, relying on[11] which in turn relied on the decision of the Privy Council in[12]. Accordingly, the learned Judge held that the Commissioner appointed under the Workmen's Compensation Act as a tribunal to settle the disputes between the workmen and the management is a Court[13].

In Shell Company of Australia v. Federal Commr. of Taxation[14] it was observed that the exercise of judicial power does not begin until, some tribunal which has power to give a binding and authoritative decision, is called upon to take action.[15] It was held that though the Sales Tax Officer was required to perform a quasi-judicial function, as his main purpose was to make assessment and collection of Sales Tax, under the U.P. Sales Tax Act and therefore it could not be said to be a Court[16].

Under the Old Registration Act 3 of 1877 there was a provision (Section 75) which stated that a Sub-Registrar was to work as if he were a Civil Court. But, under the present Registration Act 1908, there is no such provision but the State can empower him to act as a Civil Court.[17]

It was held that though some bodies are not courts they decide questions judicially in the sense that they conduct the proceedings with fairness and impartiality.[18]

In the 69th Report the Law Commission of India has formulated five tests to determine whether a person or body of persons, is to be regarded as Court:

(1) Test of exercise of judicial functions under authority derived either immediately or mediately from the Sovereign.

(2) Test of definitive judgment.

(3) Test of legal power to take evidence.

(4) Test of judicial power, or of being a part of the judiciary.

(5) Test of exercise of power otherwise exercisable by civil and revenue courts.

4. PERSONA DESIGNATA

(a) Court-Tests.—In Public Prosecutor (AP) v. Legisetty Ramayya,[19] it was observed that the principles deduced from decided case law may be laid down as follows:—

(1) Where, by statute, matters are referred to the determination of a Court with no further provision, the necessary implication is that the Court will determine the matters as a Court. Its jurisdiction is enlarged with all the incidents of such jurisdiction.

(2) Where a person is indicated not by name but by official designation, the question whether such a person is a persona designata or not, depends upon the intention to be gathered from the words used, nature of the functions to be performed and object and purpose to be achieved.

(3) When a reference is made to an Officer presiding over a Court and not the Court itself, it does not necessarily follow that such a person is intended to act as a "persona designata" and not as a Court, because it is quite an ordinary practice for a reference to be made to the officer presiding over the Court even when the intention is to refer to the Court.

(4) When a statute confers authority on a judicial officer one should be slow in saying that the Legislature confers such authority on the said officer as a "persona designata".

(5) Where a Judicial Officer who presides over a Court is appointed to perform a function under any statute and he is intended by the statute to act not otherwise than in a judicial capacity, in the absence of any other indication to the contrary, he cannot come within the expression "persona designata" and he acts as a court only.

(6) When a Judicial Authority, like an Officer who presides over a Court, is appointed to perform a function, that is to judge and decide in accordance with law and nothing has been mentioned about the finality or otherwise of the decisions made by the authority, it is an indication that the authority is to act as a Court.

(7) Whether an authority functions as a "persona designata" or as a Court does not necessarily depend on the question whether it is acting against the decision of designated persons or Tribunals, or not. Statutes are full of instances where appeals or revisions to Courts are provided even as against the decisions of designated persons and Tribunals.

Under the Act, 'Court' includes Judges and Magistrates. The expressions judge and magistrate are not defined in the Act. Under Section 20 of the Indian Penal Code the word 'Court of Justice' is defined stating that a judge who is empowered by the law to act judicially alone, or a body of judges which is empowered by law to act judicially as a body, when such judge or body of judges is acting judicially.

19. 1975 Cr LJ 144 (FB).

(b) Under Section 2(8), C.P.C.—Judge means the Presiding Officer of a Civil Court.

(c) Section 19, I.P.C.—"The word 'judge' denotes not only every person who is officially designated as Judge, but also every person,—who is empowered by law to give, in any legal proceeding, civil or criminal, a definitive judgment, or a judgment which, if not appealed against, would be definitive, or a judgment which, if confirmed by some other authority, would be definitive, or who is one of a body of persons, which body of persons is empowered by law to give such a judgment". Under Section 3(32) of the General Clauses Act, "Magistrate shall include every person exercising all or any of the powers of a Magistrate under the Code of Criminal Procedure for the time being in force."

5. JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS HELD TO BE THAT OF A 'COURT'

(a) Where a Magistrate released an accused on bail and ultimately discharged the accused on submission of the final report by the police stating that the complainant made a false complaint against the accused, the question arose whether the magistrate acted judicially and was therefore, a Court. The Supreme Court held that while deciding a matter for granting bail, though the complainant made a false complaint, the Magistrate acts judicially and therefore it is a Court and taking of cognizance of any offence by a Magistrate under Section 190 Cr PC is not a condition precedent for him to be regarded as a Court.[20]

(b) A Magistrate making the enquiry for committing a case to the Court of Sessions.[21]

(c) The Coroner under the Coroner's Act is a Court.[22]

(d) Assistant Collector acting under Section 134 of the Excise Act is a Court within the meaning of Section 195 of Cr PC.[23]

(e) Where a person filed a false affidavit before a Rent Control Officer, the question arose in Chandra Pal Singh v. Maharaj Singh whether the Rent Control Officer is a 'Court' and a complaint by him is a precondition for taking cognizance of such an offence (filing false affidavit is an offence under Section 193, C.P.C.) by a Criminal Court. The Supreme Court reversing the decision of the Allahabad High Court in 1981 All Cr. R. 98 held that the Rent Controller, under the U.P. Urban Buildings (Regulation of Letting, Rent and Eviction) Act, 1972 is a 'Court' and a complaint by the Court is a pre-condition for taking cognizance of such an offence by any Criminal Court that, if the pre-condition is not satisfied, the Criminal Court will not have any jurisdiction.

A Rent Controller acting under A.P. Buildings (Lease, Rent and Eviction) Control Act who is authorised to record evidence of the parties by virtue of rule 8(2) of the rules framed under the Act, is a Court.[24]

(f) Under the Bihar Consolidation of Holdings and Prevention of Fragmentation Act, 1956, the authorities under the Act constitute a 'Court' as the provisions of the Evidence Act, are applicable to the proceedings before them.

(g) Tribunals:—Industrial Tribunal.—(i) In the case of Industrial Tribunal under the Industrial Tribunals Act of 1947 it was first held that it is like a court but not a court in the technical sense.[25]

It was held that in an enquiry under Section 11, the Industrial Tribunal is a court, because Section 11(3) authorises it to take evidence, and it is granted powers as are vested in the Civil Courts.[26]

(ii) The Act was made applicable by Section 90(3) of the Representation of People Act, 1951 to Election Tribunals. So also it was made applicable to Railway Rate Tribunal but it was given discretion under rule 51 of the rules to relax any of the provisions.[27]

(h) Proceedings of a Commissioner under Public Servants (Inquiries) Act of 1950.

It was held by the Supreme Court that a Commissioner appointed under Public Servants (Inquiries) Act 37 of 1950, is not a Court. It was pointed out that in order to constitute a court, apart from having some of the trappings of a judicial tribunal, he should have power to give a decision or a definitive judgment which has finality and authoritativeness.[37] appeal under the U.P. Municipalities Act 2 of 1916 is not legally authorised to take evidence. The right to receive evidence is not an incident of an appellate court. Wherever the appellate court possesses the right to receive evidence it is by virtue of an express enactment such as those contained in Section 428 Cr.P.C. and Order 41, Rule 27 C.P.C.[41]

8. FACT

The definition under this section read with the illustrations refers to two kinds of facts, namely, physical fact and psychological fact. They can be proved either by direct or indirect evidence. This definition was taken from the classification of facts made by BENTHAM. According to him, physical facts are such as either have their seat in some inanimate being or if in one that is animate, then not by virtue of the qualities which constitute it such; while psychological facts are those which have their seat in an animate being by virtue of the qualities by which it is constituted animate". It is stated in the Draft Report of the Select Committee which was published in [Gazettee of India dated 1st July, 1871, part 5, p. 273], that each class of facts has in common one element which entitles them to the name of facts that can be directly perceived either with or without the intervention of senses. Clause (1) refers to external parts which can be perceived by the five senses [see ill. (a)(b) & (c)]. Clause (2) refers to internal facts which are the subjects of consciousness [see ill. (d) & (e)]. The state of man's mind is as much a fact as the state of his digestion per BOWEN LJ in.[42] A misrepresentation as to the intention of a person is a misrepresentation of fact [see ill. (d)][43] According to STEPHEN'S Introduction (P. 20) the word 'Fact' is sometimes opposed to theories, sometimes to opinion, sometimes to feeling but all these modes of using it are more or less rhetorical. According to BEST there are two other divisions of fact: (1) Events or states of things. (2) Positive or affirmative, and Negative. For example the fall of a tree is an event, whereas the existence of a tree is a state of thing. But both are facts. For the latter division, the existence of certain states of things is a positive or affirmative fact whereas the non-existence of it is a negative fact.[44] ; such as non-availability of an alternate accommodation to a tenant refers to a state of things, hence it is a positive fact coming within the definition of 'fact'. It is not absence of a fact.[45] The definition does not restrict a fact to something which can be exhibited as a material object.[46] Mental condition is a fact but inference arrived at by a person by a process of ratiocination, being not a mental condition of that person, is not a fact.[47] Question of prejudice is a fact.[48] Likewise question of intention is a fact.[49] 'Matter of fact' is anything which is the subject of testimony.

"..... the term "fact" is being used in three different senses :

- the information provided by witnesses and other evidence;
- the conclusions drawn by the trier of fact from the information presented in Court as to what actually happened;
- the legal concepts, facts in issue, that must be established if a particular party to legal proceedings is to succeed."[50]

'Matter of law' is the general law of the land of which the courts will take judicial cognizance.

Events and facts which are likely to occur in future do not fall within the definition of "facts".[51]

9. RELEVANT

According to THAYER, "There is another precept which should be laid down as preliminary in stating the law of evidence, namely, that unless excluded by some rule or principle of law, all that is logically probative is admissible. This general admissibility, however, of what is logically probative is not, like, the former principle, a necessary presupposition in a rational system of evidence; there are many exceptions to it. Yet, in order to have a clear conception of law, it is important to notice this also as being a fundamental proposition. In a historical sense, it has not been the fundamental thing, to which the different exclusions were exceptions. What has taken place, in fact, is the shutting out by the Judges of one and another thing from time to time; and so, gradually, the recognition of this exclusion under a rule. These rules of exclusion have had their exceptions; and so the law has come into the shape of a set of primary rules of exclusion; and then a set of exceptions to these rules."

The way the word 'relevant' is defined would show no indication of the definiteness of that word; it simply says that one fact is said to be relevant to another when the one is connected with the other in any of the ways referred to in the provisions of this Act relating to the relevancy of facts. Sections 5 to 55 of the Act give the methods one should adopt to know whether a particular fact is relevant for the determination of the issues arising out of the list between the parties. Facts relevant to an issue are those facts which are necessary to prove or disprove the fact in issue.

The word 'relevant' means that any two facts to which it is applied are so related to each other that, according to the common course of events, one, either taken by itself or in connection with other facts, proves or renders probable the past, present or future existence or non-existence of the other.[52] Relevant, strictly speaking, means admissible in evidence. Erroneous admission of any evidence does not make it relevant.

The word 'relevant' is used in the Act with two meanings: (a) as connected; (b) as admissible. Firstly, it should have some connection with the issue. Secondly, such fact must be admissible. Thus in the first place it is logical and in the second place it is legal.[53] LORD HOBHOUSE said that the word 'relevant' in the Act means admissible. The Supreme Court has held that statement of witnesses to the effect that they heard from other persons at the scene of offence immediately after the occurence that the accused fired the gun is admissible as a relevant fact.[54] It may be remembered that every fact which is logically relevant having probative value is not legally admissible in evidence, because admissibility is based on certain principles of law, and not on logic. Of course, admissibility presupposes relevancy. For example, in a theft case other instances of theft by the accused may be logically relevant but not admissible if they are very remote in point of time, because it may create prejudice in the mind of the court. So also some relevant facts having logical probative value are excluded even in this Act in Sections 122, 123, 124 and 126 which deal with the disclosure of communications between husband and wife during marriage, disclosure of affairs of the state, or communications in official confidence, disclosure of communication made to a legal adviser in confidence.

Of all rules of evidence, the most universal and the most obvious is this,—that the evidence adduced should be alike directed and confined to the matters which are in dispute, or which form the subject of investigation. The theoretical propriety of this rule can never be a matter of doubt, whatever difficulties may arise in its application. The Tribunal is created to determine matters which either are in dispute between contending parties, or otherwise require proof; and anything which is neither directly nor indirectly relevant to those matters ought at once to be put aside as beyond the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, and as tending to distract its attention and to waste its time. Evidence may be rejected as irrelevant for one or two reasons: first, that the connection between the principal and evidentiary facts is too remote and conjectural; second, that it is excluded by the state of the pleadings or what is analogous to the pleadings; or is rendered superfluous by the admissions of the party against whom it is offered.[55]

"In later editions of the DIGEST STEPHEN abandoned the theory of causation as a test of relevance which he had previously held.[56] Instead, in Article 1, he defined the word "relevant" as meaning that :

"any two facts to which it is applied are so related to each other that, according to the common course of events, one, either taken by itself or in conjunction with other facts, proves or renders probable the past, present, or future existence, or non-existence of the other," and in Article 2 he stated that :

"Evidence may be given in any proceedings of any fact relevant to any fact in issue, unless it is hereinafter declared to be deemed to be irrelevant, and of any fact hereinafter declared to be deemed to be relevant to the issue, whether it is, or is not, relevant thereto. Provided that the judge may exclude evidence of facts which, though relevant or deemed to be relevant to the issue, appear to him too remote to be material under all the circumstances of the case."

The phrases "deemed to be relevant" and "deemed to be irrelevant" appear to imply that law uses the logical concept of relevance and then artificially expands and contracts it by "deeming". This usage is confusing, however, since it is now accepted that many of the exclusionary rules that STEPHEN explained as instances of "deemed irrelevance", for instance the hearsay rule, are not associated with relevance at all.[57]

In Australia, Section 55(1) of the Evidence Act 1995 (Commonwealth) states that :

"The evidence that is relevant in a proceeding is evidence that, if it were accepted, could rationally affect (directly or indirectly) the assessment of the probability of the existence of a fact in issue in the proceeding."

The phrase "could rationally affect [...] the assessment of the probability" might be thought preferable to STEPHEN'S "proves or renders probable" since the words "renders probable" might be thought to import the idea that evidence can only be relevant if it suggests a particular degree of likelihood. A similar deviation from STEPHEN'S definition is found in Rule 401 of the Federal Rules of Evidence (U.S.A.), which defines "relevant evidence" as "evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact [...] more probable or less probable" in order to avoid the same potential confusion."[58]

Drawing inference of "participes criminis"—Factors relevant.—In a bride burning case, the mother-in-law and the husband were accused. The mother-in-law was present in the house and there was possibility of presence of the husband also at the time of occurrence of the incident and thereafter his reaching in a nearby village could not be ruled out. Subsequent conduct of the accused was unnatural and inculpatory. In the facts and circumstances of the case it was not possible for the mother-in-law alone to commit the crime. An inference was drawn that accused/husband was participes criminis and his acquittal was converted into conviction.[59] Where no injury suffered by the victim was attributable to the weapon allegedly used by the accused, his participation in the commission of the crime was doubtful.[60]

The expression 'irrelevant' was used in secs. 24, 29, 43, 52, 54 and 165 of this Act.

10. RELEVANCY AND ADMISSIBILITY

More often the expressions 'relevancy' and 'admissibility' are used as synonyms but their legal implications are distinct and different for, more often than not, facts which are relevant may not be admissible, for example, communication made by spouses during marriage or between an advocate and his client though relevant are not admissible; so also facts which are admissible may not be relevant, for example, questions permitted to be put in cross-examination to test the veracity or impeach the credit of witnesses, though not relevant, are admissible.[61] The germane question is not as to in connection with what offence during the investigation the evidence had come to light, but whether the evidence so collected is relevant and admissible to establish the charge in the present case.[62] Evidence of a witness, who dies prior to his cross-examination, is admissible in evidence, though the evidentiary value will depend upon the facts and circumstances of the case.[63] If a lease deed, required to be registered, is not registered, it is inadmissible in evidence.[64] The contention, that the document which is required to be registered is not admissible in evidence at all, cannot be accepted. Such a contention is against the express provision of Section 49 of the Registration Act. The unregistered lease deed can certainly be looked into for collateral purpose of proving a party's character of possession.[65]

"Relevancy must be distinguished from admissibility, of which, though the primary, it is by no means the sole condition. A fact may be relevant and yet, on grounds of convenience or policy, evidence of it may be inadmissible. Indeed this exclusion of matter otherwise relevant has been called the distinguishing feature of the English law of evidence. It is correct then, in deciding whether evidence of a fact is admissible, to ask first whether the fact is relevant[66] and, thereafter, whether there are any rules or discretions, based on convenience or policy, which nonetheless make evidence of the relevant fact inadmissible."[67]

"Evidence is relevant if it is logically probative or disprobative of some matter which requires proof."[68]

"Relevant evidence is prima facie admissible unless excluded for some other reason whereas irrelevant evidence is not admissible."[69]

"Relevant evidence" means evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence.[70]

"Evidence is admissible if it may be lawfully adduced at a trial."[71]

"Litigants are not free to place whatever information they wish before the court to establish the facts. The information must be admissible evidence, often referred to as judicial evidence. Evidence is not admissible, if it is not relevant, if its prejudicial effect is greater than its probative value, if its admission would have an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings or if it is excluded by any other specific rule of evidence."[72]

"Not all admissible evidence is universally relevant. Admissible evidence may be relevant to one count of an indictment and not to another. It may be admissible against one accused (or party) but not another. It may be admissible to rebut a defence but inadmissible to reinforce the case for the prosecution."[73]

11. FACT IN DISPUTE—PROOF

The inference of proof of a fact in dispute, having been established, can be drawn from the given objective facts, direct or circumstantial.[74] Paper cutting cannot be relied upon as evidence in proof of sale deed.[75]

12. "FACTS IN ISSUE"

"Subject to the various qualifications in earlier chapters, the facts which may be proved in a judicial inquiry are facts in issue and facts relevant to the issue, and any facts, whether relevant to the issue or not, which affect the legal reception or weight of the evidence tendered.

Facts in issue, which are sometimes called "principal" facts, are those necessary by law to establish the claim, liability or defence, forming the subject-matter of the proceedings; and which are in dispute between the parties. In civil cases, the Court may give directions about the issues on which it requires evidence."[76]

'Facts in issue' are facts out of which some legal right, liability, or disability, involved in the inquiry, necessarily arises, and upon which, accordingly, decision must be arrived at. Matters which are affirmed by one party to a suit and denied by the other may be denominated as facts in issue; what facts are in issue in particular cases, is a question to be determined by the substantive law or, in some cases, by that branch of the law of procedure which regulates the law of pleadings, civil or criminal.[77]

"The facts in issue in a case, sometimes called ultimate facts, are the facts which a party to litigation (including the prosecution in a criminal case) must prove in order to succeed in his claim or defence and to show his entitlement to relief (or to obtain conviction)."[78]

"Facts in issue are as much legal concepts as they are facts and are normally to be found in the substantive law, in the statute or precedent which creates the offence or the cause of action. Sometimes the facts in issue are to be found in the pleadings or in the defences raised by the accused in a criminal case : was the defendant acting in self-defence, under duress or under a mental handicap?"[79]

"There are two principal types of facts in issue, those which are in issue as a matter of substantive law, and those which are in issue as a matter of law of evidence itself.

The main facts in issue are all those facts which the plaintiff in a civil action, or the prosecutor in criminal proceedings, must prove in order to succeed, together with any further facts that the defendant or accused must prove in order to establish a defence."[80]

This expression is used in secs. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11 and illustrations (d) of Section 21 and Sections 36 and 43. Facts in issue can be divided into main facts in issue and subordinate or collateral facts. Main facts are those which are necessary under the rule of law to establish the claim, or the liability or the defence. They arise by the pleadings of the parties in dispute. Therefore, according to PHIPSON, facts in issue are determinable primarily by the substantive law and secondarily by the pleadings.[81] It was stated that, although all relevant facts are not necessarily facts in issue, still facts in issue cannot be other than relevant to the determination of the suit, and this is clear from the language of Section 6 of this Act.[82]

The explanation given under the definition of 'Facts in issue" contemplates the framing of issues under Order XIV, Rule 1 C.P.C. in Civil cases. In criminal cases the charge constitutes and includes "facts in issue" see Chapter XIII Cr. P.C., 1973. In criminal proceeding it is absolutely necessary to confine the evidence to the issue, namely, whether the accused is guilty or not, of the charges levelled against him. If precision is not observed while admitting the evidence, at times it would lead to enlarging the scope of the enquiry and finally may result in miscarriage of justice.

13. FACTS RELEVANT TO THE ISSUE

"Facts relevant to the issue, which are sometimes called "evidentiary" facts, are facts which tend, either directly or indirectly, to prove or disprove a fact in issue."[83]

14. DOCUMENT

"A document has been judicially defined as "any writing or printing capable of being made evidence, no matter on what material it may be inscribed."[84] It seems, however, that documents include many matters other than mere writings, as, for instance, tape recordings, or television film.[85]

In statutes the term "writing," unless the contrary appears, includes typing, printing, lithography, photography and other modes or representing or reproducing words in a visible form."[86]

The definition of document under this section is similar to the definition in Section 29 of the Indian Penal Code.

In the term 'document' are properly included all material substances on which the thoughts of men are represented by writing, or any other species of conventional mark or symbol. Thus the wooden score on which bakers, milk-men, etc., indicate by notches, the number of loaves of bread or quarts of milk supplied to their customers are documents as much as the most elaborate deeds.[87]

According to STEPHEN, document is "Any substance having any matter expressed or described upon it by marks capable of being read". But this term document in this Act would show that the definition given here is wider than STEPHEN'S definition. According to WHARTON, document is an instrument on which is recorded by means of letters, figures or marks, matter which may be evidentially used.

If the Court is satisfied that there is no trick photography and the photograph is above suspicion, the photograph can be received in evidence. But the evidence of photographs to prove writing or handwriting can only be received if the original cannot be obtained and the photographic reproduction is faithful and not faked or false.[88] It was held that tape records of speeches are documents as they stand on no different footing from photographs provided that the accuracy of the recording is proved and the sounds recorded are identified. The Tripura High Court has held that document includes foreign currency as per Section 19 clause 3 of Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947.[89]

In[90] it is observed: "Document" includes, in addition to a document in writing, any map, plan, graph, drawing, photograph, disc, tape, sound track or similar device, or any film, microfilm, tape or similar device: [The English] Civil Evidence Act, 1968, S. 10(1).[91] 'Document' means anything in which information of any description is recorded, and 'copy' in relation to a document, means anything onto which information recorded in the document has been copied, by whatever means and whether directly or indirectly.[92] Special equipment for reproducing film not admissible as a document, but the Court, being master of its own procedure, could adapt to meet modern inventions.[93] Transcript of evidence of previous criminal proceedings[94] title documents.[95] Tape recording is a document provided that what is recorded is information. Document also includes 'electronic records produced for the inspection of the Court':[96]

For a case where tape recordings were admitted in a civil case.[97]

See also Section 3(18) General Clauses Act (10 of 1897) and Section 29 I.P.C. where 'document' is defined.

In Grant v. South Western Properties,[98] it was held that a tape recording was a 'document' which could be the subject matter of discovery. Though it did not provide information for the eye but only for the ear it was still a document liable for inspection which is not limited to ocular inspection but included scrutiny or examination by any of the senses.

The Sea Customs Act, Section 138C (introduced by Art. 29/1988) and the Central Excise Act, Section 36B (introduced by Art. 29/1988) which are in almost identical terms provide that notwithstanding any other law for the time being in force:

(a) a micro film of a document or the reproduction of the image or images embodied in such micro film (whether enlarged or not),

(b) a fascimile copy of a document, or

(c) a statement contained in a document and included in printed material produced by a computer (subject to certain conditions laid down in the acts), shall be deemed to be a document for the purposes of the Acts and admissible in any proceeding thereunder without further proof or production of the original as evidence of the contents of the original.

Where a document evidencing partition had no description of the property falling to the share of the respective parties, such a document was not a partition deed, requiring any registration and was admissible in evidence showing severance of the joint status of the parties.[1]

See also the Civil Evidence Act, 1968 in England which provides for the admissibility of statement produced by a computer subject to strict conditions to ensure that the information is reliable.

15. EVIDENCE

The word 'Evidence' in the popular sense means that by which facts are established to the satisfaction of persons enquiring into them—but narrowed down by certain legal rules contrived to secure as far as possible its sufficiency and credibility; that is, facts sufficient generally to satisfy or convince to prudent person of clear understanding, may not be sufficient to fulfil the requirements of the law in matters arising for judicial determination.[2] The word 'evidence', considered in relation to law, includes all the legal means, exclusive of mere argument, which tend to prove or disprove any matter of fact, the truth of which is submitted to judicial investigation.

The evidence of a fact is that which tends to prove it, Courts are usually to find that certain facts exist before pronouncing on the rights, duties and liabilities of the parties; which, in other words, may be called as "Judicial Evidence". According to STEPHEN who sponsored this Act it means "that part of the law of procedure which, with a view to ascertain the individual rights and liabilities in particular cases, decides what facts may or may not be proved in such a case; what sort of evidence has to be given of a fact which may be proved, by whom and in what manner the evidence must be produced relating to a fact which is to be proved". To put it in other words, the statements made by the witness in Court under the legal rules relating to the matters of fact under enquiry and or the documents produced for the inspection of the judge or the court may be termed as evidence.

"Evidence, as used in judicial proceedings, has several meanings. The two main senses of the word are : first, the means, apart from argument and inference, whereby the Court is informed as to the issues of fact as ascertained by the pleadings; secondly, the subject-matter of such means. The word is also used to denote that some fact may be admitted as proof and also in some cases that some fact has relevance to the issues of fact. In a real sense evidence is that which may be placed before the Court in order that it may decide the issues of fact. There also are other shades of meaning that it is not necessary to discuss here. (For example, it was held that "evidence" in the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act 1938 covers all the material that persons outside a Court of law take into consideration when deciding how to act.[3]) Evidence, in the first sense, means the testimony, whether oral, documentary or real, which may be legally received in order to prove or disprove some fact in dispute. In the second sense it means the content of that testimony."[4]

WIGMORE states that the term evidence means any knowable facts or group of facts, not a legal or a logical principle, considered with a view to its being offered before a legal tribunal for the purpose of producing a persuasion, positive or negative, on the part of the tribunal as to the truth of a proposition, not of law, or of logic, on which the determination of the tribunal is to be asked.[5]

TAYLOR states that it includes all the legal means exclusive of mere argument, which tend to prove or disprove any matter of fact, the truth of which is submitted to judicial investigation.[6]

According to BENTHAM, "It is any matter of fact, the effect, tendency, or design of which, when presented to the mind, is to produce in the mind a persuasion concerning the existence of some other matter of fact—a persuasion either affirmative or dis-affirmative of its existence. Of the two facts so connected, the latter may be distinguished as the principal fact, and the former as the evidentiary fact.[7]

"Any specific facts or set of facts, employed for the purpose of inferring therefrom the existence of any other fact, is said to be evidence of that fact."[8]

"At its most general level, this term means those items of information which are presented to the court by the parties as a means of persuading the court that their argument is correct—in other words, information advanced to prove their case."[9]

"Evidence may be defined as any material which tends to persuade the court of the truth or probability of some fact asserted before it."[10]

"The evidence of fact is that which tends to prove it—something which may satisfy an inquirer of the fact's existence."[11]

This term and the word proof are often used as synonyms, but the latter is applied by accurate logicians rather to the effect of evidence than to evidence itself.

Under the present Act, matters other than statements of witnesses and documents produced for the inspection of the Court, e.g. (a) a confession or a statement of an accused in a trial; statements made by parties when examined otherwise than as witnesses; demeanour of any witness under examination; (b) the result of local investigation or local inspection and (c) material objects other than documents such as weapons, tools, stolen properties etc., are not 'evidence' according to the definition of the Act.

The juristic conception of the term 'evidence' in the case of the oral testimony of witnesses is that the party against whom it is used has had the right and opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses. So long as the accused is not allowed the right and opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses, any statements made by them can only be described as statements but cannot be dignified with the name of evidence.[12]

The definition of 'evidence' covers (a) the evidence of witnesses and (b) documentary evidence.

Therefore, a statement of a witness recorded under Section 154, Cr.P.C. is not evidence though it may be considered for other purposes.[13] Result of investigation is not a legal evidence.[14] Finding of the guilt of the accused can be based only on the evidence produced during trial and not on the result of investigation by the police.[15]

The word "evidence" includes statement of the witness which has not been tested on cross-examination. The Court, however, should exercise such power in the rarest of rare cases.[16] Where the name of a person is mentioned in the F.I.R., the F.I.R. is evidence at this stage and can be taken into consideration for the purposes of summoning the said person as accused.[17]

The Privy Council observed: 'A statement made under Section 164, Cr.P.C. can never be used as substantive evidence of the facts stated, but it can be used to support or challenge evidence given in Court by the person who made the statement. The statement made by the approver under Section 164 plainly does not amount to the corroboration in material particulars which the courts require in relation to the evidence of an accomplice. An accomplice cannot corroborate himself; tainted evidence does not lose its taint by repetition. But in considering whether the evidence of the approver given before the committing Magistrate was to be preferred to that which he gave in the Sessions Court, the Court was entitled to have regard to the fact that very soon after the occurrence, he had made a statement in the same sense as the evidence which he gave before the Committing Magistrate.[18]

It was held by the Madras High Court that evidence in its ordinary sense signifies that which makes apparent the truth of the matter in question. It is no doubt more frequently applied to proof before a judicial tribunal, but it is not necessarily confined to this sense; it is used with equal correctness to express the information acquired by any person who undertakes an enquiry on the matter in question.[19]

The definition of evidence is considered to be incomplete as it does not include the whole material on which the decision of the judge may rest.

16. AFFIDAVIT

An affidavit can be termed to be an evidence within the ambit of Section 3 only in those cases where the same is filed at the instance or under the direction of the court[20] or law specifically permits for proof of anything by affidavit.[21] Affidavits are admissible in evidence and do not become inadmissible because the ex parte order is set aside. More so where the state amendments permit adducing of evidence by affidavit.[22] Where the police officials deposed in an affidavit that the sample seized from the accused under N.D. & P.S. Act was not tampered with till it reached the Forensic Science Laboratory which was neither assailed when tendered in evidence nor were the deponants cross-examined by the defence counsel, the contents of the affidavit would be deemed to be admitted by the accused.[23] The contention, that the decree, passed on the basis of the affidavit filed without permission which was no evidence, was a nullity, was taken to be not correct as other documents on record were also considered.[24]

17. FUNCTIONS OF THE LAW OF EVIDENCE

According to WHARTON the main function of the rules of evidence is to narrow down the matter which comes before the Court to the facts relating to those matters which have a logical probative value in determining the innocence or guilt of the accused and to prevent giving judgments based on illogical conclusions or prejudice, and as an aid to the administration of justice.[25]

18. CLASSIFICATION OF EVIDENCE

Broadly speaking, Evidence can be classified into (1) Direct and Indirect or circumstantial evidence.

(2) Primary and Secondary Evidence

(3) Oral and Documentary Evidence

(4) Real Evidence

(5) Original and Hearsay Evidence

(6) Presumptive Evidence.

(a) Direct Evidence.—"By direct evidence is meant that the existence of a given thing or fact is proved either by its actual production, or by the testimony or admissible declaration of someone who has himself perceived it."[26]

"Direct evidence is evidence which, if believed, establishes a fact in issue."[27]

"Direct evidence is evidence which requires no mental process on the part of the tribunal of fact in order to draw the conclusion sought by the proponent of the evidence, other than acceptance of the evidence itself."[28]

Direct evidence consists either of the testimony of the witness who perceived the fact or the production of the documents which constitute the fact which is in question. This direct evidence is sometimes called original evidence which arises from the personal knowledge of the witness. Direct evidence, if believed, proves the existence of a fact in issue without any inference of presumption.

Pericipient Evidence.—"The term direct evidence has a second meaning in the usage of many writers. The alternative term pericipient evidence not only avoids any possibility of confusion, but is also more appropriate to describe the opposite of hearsay evidence... Pericipent evidence is evidence of facts which a witness personally perceives using any of his senses."[29]

(b) Indirect or Circumstantial Evidence.—Indirect Evidence otherwise known as circumstantial evidence is evidence that gives rise to a logical inference that such a fact does exist. Circumstantial evidence may be either conclusive or presumptive. It is conclusive when there is a connection between the principal fact and the evidentiary fact. It is presumptive where the fact rests on a greater or a less degree of probability. The effect of circumstantial evidence on consideration must be such as not to admit more than one solution, and must be inconsistent with any explanation that the fact is not true.

"By indirect or presumptive evidence is meant that other facts are thus proved, from which the existence of the given fact may be logically inferred."[30]

"Circumstantial evidence is evidence from which the desired conclusion may be drawn but which requires the tribunal of fact not only to accept the evidence presented but also draw an inference from it."[31]

"Circumstantial evidence ..... consists of evidence of circumstances, none of which speak directly to the facts in issue but from which those facts may be inferred. Feelings of animosity towards the victim, presence in the area of the attack, the victim's blood on the accused clothing—all these build up into a strong but inferential case."[32]

'Circumstantial evidence' ..... may be defined as any fact (sometimes called an 'evidentiary fact', 'factum probans' or 'fact relevant to the issue') from the existence of which the judge or jury may infer the existence of a fact in issue (sometimes called a 'principal fact' or 'factum probandum').[33]

The standard of proof required to convict a person on circumstantial evidence is well-established by a series of decisions of the Supreme Court. According to that standard the circumstances relied upon in support of the conviction must be fully established[34] and the chain of evidence furnished by those circumstances must be so far complete as not to leave any reasonable ground for a conclusion consistent with the innocence of the accused[35] and further it must be such as to show that within all human probability the act must have been done by the accused[36] and, if two views are possible on such evidence, the view pointing towards the innocence of the accused is to be adopted.[37] However, this does not mean that before the prosecution can succeed in a case resting upon circumstantial evidence alone, it must meet any and every hypothesis suggested by the accused, however extravagant and fanciful it might be. Further, it is not necessary that every one of the proved facts must in itself be decisive of the complicity of the accused or point conclusively to this guilt. Therefore, when deciding the question of sufficiency, what the Court has to consider is the total cumulative effect of all the proved facts each one of which re-enforces the conclusion of guilt.[38] It is the cumulative result of all the circumstances which must unerringly point to the guilt of the accused and not one circumstance by itself.[39] In such cases, the Court must guard against the danger of allowing conjecture or suspicion to take the place of legal proof.[40] Insufficient circumstantial evidence, benefit of doubt,[41] explains the requirements as to circumstantial evidence.[42] If any rational explanation is possible, then there is an element of doubt of which the accused must be given the benefit.[43]

Essential ingredients to prove guilt by circumstantial evidence are:

(1) Circumstances from which conclusion is drawn should be fully proved.

(2) Circumstances should be conclusive.

(3) All facts so established should be consistent only with the hypothesis of guilt and inconsistent with innocence of the accused.

(4) Circumstances should exclude the possibility of guilt of a person other than the accused.[44]

As evidence there is no difference between direct and circumstantial evidence. The only difference is in that as proof, the former directly establishes the commission of the offence whereas the later does so by placing circumstances which lead to irresistible inference of guilt.[45]

There is no difference between civil and criminal cases in the application of circumstantial evidence and their admissibility.[46] Regarding the appreciation of circumstantial evidence in civil cases, preponderance of probabilities should be looked at in deciding the cases, whereas, in criminal cases, strict scrutiny of each of the facts placed by circumstantial evidence and their cumulative effect has to be taken into consideration and if they are of such nature as to be incompatible with the innocence of the accused, then only conviction can follow.

Circumstantial evidence means communication of facts, creating a net work from which there is no escape for the accused, because the facts taken as a whole do not admit any inference except that of the guilt of the accused.[47]

However where neither prosecution nor defence has come out with the whole and unvarnished truth, Courts can only try to guess or conjecture to decipher truth if possible.[48] However, prosecution is not the gainer and it sinks or swims on the basis of its own case.[49]

The fact in issue was whether liquor possessed was of illicit origin. The Excise Sub-Inspector was not examined to prove the fact in issue, but the excise clerk was examined to prove the report of the Excise Sub-Inspector who had been transferred. It was held that it could not take the place of the sworn statement of the maker thereof to prove that the liquor was of illicit origin, as the accused was deprived of the advantage of testing the accuracy of the Sub-Inspector's opinion by cross-examining him.[50]

Circumstantial evidence is sometimes more reliable than direct evidence.[51] Where the names and description of the accused were wanting in the F.I.R. but a witness identified them quarrelling with the deceased and other material on record also proved prima facie case against them, bail was not granted.[52]

In the case of circumstantial evidence, onus is on the prosecution to prove that the chain is complete. Infirmity or lacuna in prosecution cannot be cured by false defence or plea.[53]

It is the function of the court to separate the grain from the chaff and accept what appears to be true and reject the rest.[54] Where an open injury was caused to the accused but no blood was found at the spot of occurrence, the same does not improbabilise the prosecution story about the occurrence to have taken place at the place claimed by the prosecution. It depends on the facts and circumstances of each case.[55]

In a case of murder allegedly caused by poisoning, the medical evidence did not prove death by any poison whereas other circumstances warranted the guilt of the accused, the accused could be convicted even if the medical evidence was negative.[56] In a murder case, conviction cannot be based solely on the evidence of the accused and the deceased last seen together.[57]

Appreciation of circumstantial evidence cannot create presumption of guilt.[58] Standard of proof in incidential matters is the same as in other.[59]

JUSTICE HIDAYATULLAH observed "Circumstantial evidence in this context means a combination of facts creating a net-work through which there is no escape for the accused, because the facts taken as a whole do not admit of any inference but of his guilt."[60] He also quoted the following words of BARON PARKE J in Towell's case[61] "the circumstances may often be so clearly proved, so closely connected with it, or leading to one result in conclusion, that the mind may be as well convinced as if it were proved by eye-witnesses".

Cases — In a murder case the accused persons and the deceased were last seen boarding the taxi of the deceased at 4 a.m., the accused allegedly sold the wrist watch of the deceased at 1.30 p.m. the same day, the dead body of the deceased was found in the same taxi, the accused were identified by the witness in the T.I. parade held within two weeks of the incident, information given by the accused led to the recovery of the wrist watch of the deceased, the report of the finger print expert and the autopsy report were held to constitute circumstantial evidence sufficient to convict them.[62] In a case the police officials were charged to have killed the occupants of a speeding vehicle by fire-arms. They took the plea that the occupants of the vehicle also were firing from their fire-arms but the pistols shown to have been found near the dead bodies were found to be never used and defective by ballistic expert and the glasses of the police vehicle were not broken. No damage was found in the vehicle in which the police officers were chasing whereas the glasses of the vehicle of the victims were broken and there were marks of firing on it. One of the accused police officials took away the station diary which was made available after four days and was found to be manipulated. It was held that the accused were liable to be convicted.[63] Where in a murder trial, the blood stained clothes of the deceased and an axe, the weapon of offence, were recovered on the pointing out of the accused, the dead body also was recovered from his house which he failed to explain and the motive was also proved, they all constitute circumstantial evidence sufficient to convict the accused.[64]

Where the main evidence against the accused persons was their identification by the victim for the first time in the Court and other evidence were recovery of the watch of the victim from the accused and their finger prints, the same was not found to be sufficient to convict them and they were given benefit of doubt.[65] Only a remote possibility of innocence in favour of the guilty person, cannot be a ground to allow him to escape punishment.[66]

(c) Direct and Indirect Evidence compared.—"The two forms are equally admissible, and the testimony, whether to the factum probandum or the facta probantia, is equally direct; but the superiority of the former is that it contains at most only one source of error, fallibility of assertion, while the latter has, in addition, fallibility of inference. Little is to be gained from a comparison of their weight, since, save in the case of actual production, both forms admit of every degree of cogency from the lowest to the highest."[67]

(d) Primary & Secondary evidence.—"As commonly used, these terms apply to the kinds of proof that may be given of the contents of a document, irrespective of the purpose for which such contents, when proved, may be received.[68] Primary evidence means the best or highest kind, that which the law regards as affording the greatest certainty of the fact in question: thus, production of the original document, or proof of an admission of its contents by the party against whom it is tendered, is considered primary in this sense. Secondary evidence means inferior or substitutionary evidence, that which itself indicates the existence of more original sources of information; thus, a copy , or the testimony of a witness who has read the document, is secondary. In Lucas v. Williams,[69] Lord ESHER remarked : "Primary evidence is evidence which the law requires to be given first: secondary evidence is evidence which may be given in the absence of that better evidence, when a proper explanation of its absence has been given." This, however, is only approximately true, for the law in some cases requires secondary evidence to be given first, and in others allows the production of primary evidence to be optional. The terms "primary" and "secondary" are also occasionally applied to proof of handwriting, and attestation; and TAYLOR regarded depositions as secondary evidence of oral testimony."[70]

(e) Oral Evidence.—See Chapter IV.

(f) Documentary Evidence.—PETER MURPHY defines documentary evidence as "Evidence afforded by any document produced for the inspection of Court, whether as direct or hearsay evidence of its contents."[71]

One of the essential elements of due execution of a document is that the document should be signed by the party or parties associated with it. The words "intended" to be used, or which may be used, in the definition of the word "document" in Section 3, Evidence Act necessarily imply that the document has to be used by some party against another. If it is to be so used there should be intrinsic evidence in the document itself of some particular party or parties being associated with the same. Where the document bears the signature of the executant this is undoubtedly evidence of such association. Where there is no such signature and the document stands completely detached from and unconnected with any person or party, there can be no question of the same being used by anybody against another. Again, before a person can be bound by a particular document, he must be proved to have 'executed' it.[72] The documents marked as exhibits without proof cannot form the basis of judgment.[73]

A certified copy from the school register regarding the age, and the affidavit by the father giving the date of birth, would amount to documentary evidence.[74]

Document procured by illegal means is no bar to its admissibility if it is relevant and its genuineness is proved. While examining its genuiness the circumstances under which it came to be produced in the court have to be taken into consideration.[75] Slips containing entries seized in search of the premises, if such entries therein are carried into account books seized along with them, are admissible.[76] Documents referred to in Section 173, Cr.P.C., are in a sense evidence, as both prosecution and accused can rely or refer to them in exercising the right of being heard under Section 251-A clauses 2 and 3 of Cr.P.C.[77] This is reversed on another point in P. Sirajuddin v. State of Madras.[78] Where the witness did not depose to the signature of the executant, nor was the document put to the executant, the document is not proved and therefore not admissible.[79] A Government resolution, dated 15-10-1970 repeatedly referred to an earlier resolution of 1963, which was not produced. It was held that the intrinsic evidentiary value of the 1970 resolution could be relied on, in proof of the 1963 resolution.[80] In land acquisition cases, the mere statement about the sales without the examination of vendees or persons attesting the sales, are not admissible in evidence for determining the value of the lands.[81] Where a document was not produced in Court but another document viz., a settlement deed, in which a reference to the document was made, was filed, it was held that, it was not sufficient proof of the document.[82]

Non-registration is no ground for suspecting the genuineness of a document such as a lease deed which does not require registration.[83]

Where there is documentary evidence and also a mass of conflicting oral testimony, it is always desirable and indeed safe to let the documents speak for themselves.[84]

Where death of the injured person had occurred long before the commencement of the trial, his wound certificate cannot be brought on record.[85]

See also Chapter V.

(g) Real Evidence.—PHIPSON[86] states : "Material objects other than documents, produced for inspection of the Court, are commonly called real evidence. This, when available, is probably the most satisfactory kind of all, since, save for identification or explanation, neither testimony nor inference is relied upon. Unless its genuineness is in dispute, the thing speaks for itself.

Unfortunately, however, the term "real evidence" is itself both indefinite and ambiguous, having been used in three divergent senses :

(1) EVIDENCE FROM THINGS AS DISTINCT FROM PERSONS.

(2) MATERIAL OBJECTS PRODUCED FOR THE INSPECTION OF THE COURT. This is the second and most widely accepted meaning of "real evidence". It must be borne in mind that there is a distinction between a document used as a record of a transaction, such as a conveyance, and a document as a thing. It depends on the circumstances in which classification it falls. On a charge of stealing a document, for example, the document is a thing.

(3) PERCEPTION BY THE COURT (OR ITS RESULT) AS DISTINCT FROM THE FACTS PERCEIVED. Although the physical production of objects is a valuable factor in juridical proof and of use in technical classification, it is questionable whether the term "real evidence" is a very helpful one by which to express it. The phrase is hardly ever used in practice, material objects being referred to either by name, or, more loosely, as circumstantial evidence. In textbooks, especially when dealing with classification, the phrase is occasionally convenient. Which of its meanings then should be retained? It seems advisable to adhere to the more usual definition "material objects, other than documents, produced for the inspection of the Court."

"A term employed to denote any material from which the court may draw conclusions or inferences by using its own senses. The genus includes material objects produced to the court for its inspection, the presentation of the physical characteristics of any person or animal, the demeanour of witnesses (which may or may not be offered or presented to the court by design), views of the locus in quo or of any object incapable of being brought to court without undue difficulty and such items as tapes, films and photographs, the physical appearance of which may be significant over and above the sum total of their contents as such."[87]

"..... information can be presented to the court in different forms : through the oral evidence of a physically present witness, through documents or through real evidence such as material objects produced in court from the nature and condition of which the jury is invited to draw conclusions. But real evidence is not restricted to physical objects but also encompasses facts such as the demeanour of witnesses or visits to the site of an occurrence."[88]

"Although it was devised by Bentham and adopted by Best, 'real evidence' is not a term which has received the blessing of common judicial usage. There is general agreement that it covers the production of material objects for inspection by the judge or jury in Court, but it is debatable how much further the term should be extended."[1]

(h) Hearsay Evidence.—"Hearsay evidence is given when a witness recounts a statement made (orally, in a document or otherwise) by another person and where the proponent of the evidence asserts that what the person, who made the statement, said was true."[2]

(i) Presumptive or prima facie Evidence.—"Presumptive or prima facie evidence is the evidence which is declared (usually by statute) to be sufficient evidence of a fact, unless and until an opponent adduces contradictory evidence, in which case the tribunal of fact must weigh all the evidence tendered by all parties, in order to decide whether the fact has been proved."[3] For example, the rule that a child aged between 7 and 12 is presumed to be doli incapax, since evidence to contradict the lack of capacity may be introduced by the prosecution.

19. OTHER EVIDENCE

(a) Conclusive Evidence.—"Conclusive evidence, which is rare, is tantamount to a rule of law, since it is evidence which no party is permitted to contradict by evidence. Conclusive evidence, therefore, is aptly named, and it would be preferable to state the fact so proved as a rule of law."[4]

For example, the rule that the child under the age of 7 years is to be taken as incapable of committing a criminal offence.

(b) Confessions of co-accused whether evidence.—The confession of an accused person against a co-accused is not evidence in the ordinary sense of the term. It does not come within the meaning of evidence contained in this section inasmuch as it is not required to be given on oath, nor in the presence of the accused, and cannot be tested by cross-examination. It is a much weaker type of evidence than the evidence of an approver which is not subject to any of these infirmities. Such a confession can only be used to lend assurance to other evidence against a co-accused. The proper way to approach a case of this kind is, first, to marshal the evidence against the accused excluding the confession altogether from consideration and see whether if it is believed, a conviction could safely be based on it. If it is capable of belief independently of the confession, then it is not necessary to call the confession in aid. But cases may arise where the judge is not prepared to act on the other evidence as it stands even though, if believed, it would be sufficient to sustain a conviction. In such an event the judge may call in aid the confession and use it to lend assurance to the other evidence and thus fortify himself in believing what without the aid of the confession he would not be prepared to accept.[5]

The confessions of persons, jointly tried for the same offence with the accused, are not according to the Bombay High Court, technically evidence.[6] But the Calcutta High Court had held in a Full Bench case that, though the evidentiary value of such confessions may be but little, they are 'evidence'.[7]

(c) Evidence of a judge.—If, in a case, a judge wishes to give evidence and intends the Court to act on his statement of facts, he should make that statement in the same manner as any other witness and not merely introduce it in his judgment. A judge cannot, without giving evidence as a witness, import into a case his own knowledge of particular facts.[8]

"Judges of the superior Courts cannot be compelled to testify to matters which have arisen before them in other trials[9] but this does not apply to collateral incidents occurring during such trials, such as the attempted rescue of a prisoner in Court.[10] It does not seem to apply to a judge of an inferior Court.[11] In practice, judges usually do not object to giving evidence as to what occurred in cases tried by them when they can assist subsequent litigation by doing so."[12]

According to WIGMORE, a judge should not use his opinion from the Bench under the guise of judicial knowledge, what he knows only as an individual observer outside the Court.[13]

A judge is not entitled to allow his view or observation to take the place of evidence, because such view or observation of his cannot be tested by cross-examination and the accused does not get an opportunity to furnish any explanation in regard to the same.[14] Where a permit was given to a lorry to ply along first class roads in the State and there was no record as to the classification of roads, in a prosecution case for plying the lorry on a road not classified as first class, the magistrate imported his personal knowledge as to the bad condition of the road and convicted the accused. It was held that the conviction is not legal as the magistrate cannot import his personal knowledge into the case.[15] No Court should go out of the record of the case and write a judgment importing its personal knowledge.[16] It would indeed be a travesty of all known principles of justice, if judges and magistrates are allowed to use their knowledge gained otherwise than by the means allowed to them by law in judging the truth of a case. Where even before the complainant was examined the magistrate admits that he had knowledge of the facts and was obviously using that knowledge, in dismissing the complaint, the procedure is illegal and cannot be approved.[17] In a case filed against an accused for possession of opium under the Opium Act, he was convicted by the magistrate on the basis of his observation and identification of the substance as opium, without having any chemical analysis or expert opinion. It was held that the conviction was illegal.[18] Where a trying magistrate himself took part in his executive capacity for obtaining chemical examiner's report on an article recovered from the accused he should not himself sit and try such accused person in his judicial capacity.[19]

A Court can take judicial notice of certain matters with which a common man of ordinary intelligence is acquainted.[20] While assessing the value to be attached to oral evidence, a judge is entitled to call into aid his experience of life and knowledge.[21]

(d) Evidence of witness belatedly examined.—Testimony of a witness cannot be discarded merely on the ground that his statement was recorded after sometime as he was not available being on duty.[22] Where the eye-witnesses before whom dying declaration was recorded were frantically busy to save the life of the deceased, their evidence could not be rejected on the ground of delay in their examination.[23] Where the evidence of the eye-witness was recorded belatedly, the witness did not report the matter to the family members of the deceased and the police immediately after the occurrence and his presence at the place of occurrence was doubtful, besides these was possibility of his being a chance witness, his evidence could not be relied upon.[24] Where the Investigating Officer stated that the eye-witnesses were examined late (8 days after the incident) as they were not available in the village and there was no proof that they disclosed the occurrence to any other person and the witnesses did not say that they were not available for examination, their evidence was rightly discarded.[25]

(e) Evidence of a witness, not cross-examined.—"Evidence" has been used in different context in different sections of the Cr.P.C. and therefore this term should be interpreted in the context it has been used in the relevant provision.

Section 299 of the Cr.P.C. permits recording of evidence in the absence of the accused in certain circumstances and such evidence of the witness who would not be cross-examined can be taken into consideration.[26]

(f) Speeches of ministers and legislators.—It is well settled that the speeches by the Ministers and the Members of Assembly are inadmissible in the Court of Law, when the provisions of an enactment are being considered.[27]

(g) Last seen evidence.—Where there was a gap of two days between the date of incident and the witness seeing the accused, his evidence cannot be called the last seen evidence.[28]

(h) Instances of those considered as evidence.—The following are some instances of what were considered as evidence:

(1) Documents produced in enquiry under Section 207A, Cr.P.C. (1898).[29]

(2) Report of a public analyst under Food Adultration Act, 1964, though there is some failure to follow the procedure prescribed in Section 13, Cl. 2.[30]

(3) Any authority, sanction or empowerment necessary under law to initiate proceedings if filed into Court, is a piece of evidence on behalf of the Government.[31]

(4) Rent receipts mentioning the number of the land and Patta No. without mentioning the amount of rent, is evidence of possession, if not rebutted.[32]

(5) Original records of a proceeding before a Court.[33]

The following are some instances which were held "not evidence":

(1) Answers by the accused under Section 313, Cr.P.C.[34]

(2) A statement of the accused in the written statement filed by him is not strictly evidence though the Court may consider it.[35]

(3) Evidence collected by the police during investigation.[36]

(4) Where there was recovery of country liquor and opium during the search of the accused, two separate charge sheets were filed against him. Evidence was found unreliable in the opium case. In the second case concerning liquor, it was held that such evidence in the opium case is not evidence in the second case.[37]

(5) Suggestions made in cross-examination, when denied by the parties, cannot be substituted for evidence.[38]

(6) Newspaper item by itself does not constitute evidence.[39]

(7) Statement of witnesses in the first information report, or before police and identification parade held by the magistrate is not substantive evidence.[40]

(8) Statement of witnesses having no personnel knowledge or means of such knowledge—is no evidence.[41]

(9) Conclusions of witnesses, including the police, are not evidence.[42]

(10) Pleadings do not constitute evidence.[43]

(11) Report of Medical Officer without statement on oath by the Medical Officer is not evidence.[44]

(12) The Court can only proceed on evidence given on oath in the witness box by the witness and not the statement made in a letter addressed to the court.[45]

The evidence given in one case upon the issues raised in that case cannot be taken into consideration in another case in which other issues arise, but parties may agree that evidence taken in one suit shall be treated as evidence in another.[46]

(13) A statement in an inquest report is not evidence by itself and cannot be pitted against the evidence of the medical witness in court.[47]

(14) Statements in an identification memo recorded by a magistrate under Section 164, Cr.P.C.[48]

(15) The writing obtained by the Court from the accused under Section 73 of this Act for purpose of comparison.[49]

(16) An affidavit of a person filed in one proceedings; such an affidavit cannot be treated as evidence in another suit or proceeding, when the deponent is alive and could be examined, or when the court did not direct proof of the facts by filing an affidavit and when the opposite party had no opportunity to cross-examine such deponent.[50]

Affidavit is no evidence unless ordered by the Court under Order 19, Rule 1, or when it is not properly drawn or verified as required under law.[51]

When the Civil Court sits in enquiry under Section 146, Cl. 1, Cr.P.C., it can use its discretion and require the person whose affidavit was filed before the magistrate under Section 145, Cr.P.C., to attend the Court for purpose of cross-examination. In such a case "evidence" includes the affidavit.[52]

Affidavit of a person not produced for examination in the court.[53]

(17) Judicial confession of a co-accused, though evidence in a generic sense, is not evidence under Section 3.[54]

(i) Panchnama.—Persons summoned as witness during police investigation are called panchas. A panchnama is merely a record of what a panch sees. The only use to which it can properly be put is that when the panch goes into the witness box and swears to what he saw, the panchnama can be used as a contemporary record to refresh his memory. If the police want to rely on a panchnama they must call a panch to prove it.[55] The panchnama of a search of premises is not evidence of what was found on the search unless the panchas are examined as witnesses.[56] Where the articles were seized under N.D. & P.S. Act and sealed on the spot and then were brought to the police station and the crime register number was entered on the panchnama and the labels, the veracity of the prosecution story was not thereby affected.[57]

(j) Seizure Memo.—Where on search at the behest of jail authorities heroin was allegedly found in possession of the accused jail inmate but neither any seizure memo was prepared nor the material witness was examined, it was held that the conviction was liable to be set aside.[58] Where there was inconsistency in evidence of prosecuting witnesses in connection with spot sealing of the packets of heroin seized and their custody so as to wipe out the possibility of tampering, conviction of the accused was liable to be set aside.[59]

(k) Inquest Report.—Clinching and reliable evidence adduced by the eye-witnesses cannot be discarded simply because the Investigating Officer by mistake fails to mention the crime number in the inquest report.[60]

(l) Tape Recording.—Tape recorded conversation is admissible provided the conversation is relevant to the matters in issue, there is identification of the voice and the accuracy of the tape recorded conversation is proved by eliminating the possibility of erasing the tape record.[61] Tape recording can be legal evidence by way of corroborating the statements of a person who deposes that the other speaker and he carried on that conversation or even of the statement of a person who may depose that he overheard the conversation between the two persons and what they actually stated had been tape recorded.[62] The time, place and accuracy of the recording must be proved by a competent witness and the voices must be properly identified.[63] The tape-recorded evidence, if it is to be acceptable, must be sealed at the earliest point of time and not opened except under the orders of the court.[64] A previous statement made by a person and recorded on tape, can be used not only to corroborate the evidence given by the witness in Court but also to contradict the evidence given before the Court as well as to test the veracity of the witness and also to impeach his impartiality.[65]

(m) Electronic Records.—Evidence will now include 'electronic records' also, as the meaning of document has been expanded to include them.[66]

(n) Tracker Dog.—Evidence of dog tracking, even if admissible, is not ordinarily of much weight.[67]

Judicial notice must be taken of the fact that the training skills and the special qualities that are found in the police dogs are now universally being recognised as being of such a high calibre that in cases such as detection of explosives, drugs etc. they are found superior and more effective than the most sophisticated instruments. In this background one needs to take cognizance of the fact that for the purpose of tracking down a criminal that special faculties, qualities and skills of the dog are aspects of which serious note must be taken. Where the police rely on such evidence, the courts would be more than fully justified in accepting it provided that it passes the test of complete scrutiny.[68]

Dog-tracking evidence must pass the test of scrutiny and reliability as in the case of any other evidence. The following guidelines must be borne in mind :

(a) That there must be a reliable and complete regard of the exact manner in which the tracking was done and the panchnama in respect of the dog tracking evidence will have to be clear and complete. It will have to be properly proved and will have to be supported by the evidence of the handler.

(b) There must be no discrepancies between the version as recorded in the panchnama and the evidence of the handler as deposed to before the Court.

(c) The evidence of the handler will have to independently pass the test of cross-examination.

(d) Material, such as the type of training imparted to the dog, its past performance, achievements reliability etc., supported, if possible and available, by documents, will have to be placed before the Court by the handler.[69]

There are some breeds of dogs and strains which are specially utilised for hunting and tracking because of their abnormally high talents. If the dog belongs to one of these categories and if it is shown to the Court that it has been specially trained for the purposes of detection, the dog-tracking evidence will have to be relied upon as being evidence of a very high calibre.[70] Where in the identification parade, held within twenty four hours of the incident, the tracker-dog, after smelling chappal and knife, found at the place of occurrence preserved with due caution, immediately picked up the two accused persons, it was held that the evidence provided by the dog was sufficient to link those two items with the accused.[71]

"In R. v. Pieterson and Holloway,[72] the Court of Appeal considered the admissibility of evidence that a tracker dog had traced from the crime scene to a particular individual. Lord TAYLOR C.J. stated that "if a dog handler can establish that a dog has been properly trained and that over a period of time the dog's reactions indicate that it is a reliable pointer to the existence of a scent from a particular individual, then that evidence should properly be admitted."[73] Detailed evidence will have to be given of the dog's training and of any tests to establish its reliability. Moreover, the trial judge should direct the jury on the need for caution in assessing the value of the evidence, because of the difficulties in investigating the accuracy and degree of certainty of the dog on the particular occasion."[74]

20. DIFFERENT CATEGORIES OF WITNESSES

(a) Relations.—It is an error to reject the evidence of witnesses on the ground they are related to the deceased. Close relatives of the deceased would normally be most reluctant to spare the real assailants and to falsely mention the name of another person.[75] There is no rule either of law or of prudence that family members of the deceased in a murder case are incompetent witnesses. There may be cases where only the family members will be the witness to the occurrence and their evidence is not to be jettisoned merely on the ground of interestedness, provided it is otherwise credible and fits in with the broad probabilities of the case.[76] However, the Court should scrutinise the evidence of such witnesses carefully.[77] The mere fact that the prosecution witnesses were the parents of the deceased would not entitle the Sessions Judge to disbelieve their evidence unless there are features which are indicative of concoction and especially when nothing had been brought out in their cross-examination to suggest that they are speaking to something which had not been witnessed by them.[78]

The evidence of relatives in the same house when murder or dacoity takes place near about midnight, cannot be said to be interested as they are natural witness.[79]

Where the witness was the father of deceased and inimical to accused, his testimony had to be viewed with great caution but not rejected if there were no infirmities.[80] When the wife of the deceased was also travelling with him at time of the accident, her evidence cannot be brushed aside merely on the ground of her being the widow of the deceased.[81] Where all the witnesses who are relations reached the scene of offence, their residential tenements being in the vicinity, their evidence cannot be discarded on ground of relationship.[82]

Where the eye-witness is closely related to the victim, his evidence is to be closely scrutinised but corroboration is not necessary for acceptance of such evidence.[83] There is no reason to disbelieve the corroborated evidence of the relatives of the deceased who were natural injured eye-witnesses.[84] In cases of relation witness whether corroboration is necessary or not will depend on the particular facts and circumstance of each case.[85] The evidence of close relations has to be examined with great care and caution as they have tendency to exaggerate or add facts. It can be accepted if there is some corroboration.[86] It cannot be discarded mechanically.[87] In the case of witness related to the deceased the corroboration required is not the kind of corroboration necessary in the case of approvers.[88] Where the related eye-witnesses withstood the test of cross-examination and their evidence was found to be reliable and not tainted, minor contradictions or omissions in their evidence were held to be immaterial.[1]

Testimony of eye-witnesses all related to deceased where enimity with accused was not proved can be relied on.[2] Eye-witnesses to the incident belonging to the deceased's caste or being his neighbours is no reason for disbelieving the witnesses.[3] When accused was charged with murder, evidence on the plea of insanity by near relations of accused, should be accepted with caution, specially when accused acted as normal man immediately.[4] Evidence of witnesses who are either tenants or relations of the deceased victim does not become unworthy of credit.[5]

Where ceremonies are to be proved, only relations who are invited can prove those ceremonies.[6] In proceedings for maintenance alleging illicit connection with other women, and cruelty, only relations of parties will know about it and their evidence is not to be rejected on ground of relationship.[7] No one else can prove a marriage better than the relation of the complainant.[8] Nearest relatives are those who can best depose about their blood relationship and to reject the testimony of a real brother because of his relationship or his residence in another village, is to ignore the basic principle of the law of evidence.[9]

In civil cases relationship cannot be a ground for discrediting a witness. Likewise, it is no argument that a witness must be believed just because the other side failed to show that the witness was interested in the party producing him. Such factors cannot determine the credibility of a witness.[10]

Evidence of possession of a house by relations cannot be discarded on account of relationship; their close relationship probabilises their personal knowledge.[11]

Where the prosecution witnesses are mother and brother of the accused, their evidence cannot be brushed aside as there is no reason for them to implicate him.[12] Where the eye-witnesses were the sons of the deceased but they made no attempt to help their father while he was being stabbed, raised no shouts and did not report the matter to the police, their testimony and presence was doubtful.[13]

(b) Interested or Partisan Witnesses.—The term 'interested' postulates that the person concerned must have some direct interest in seeing that the accused person is somehow or other convicted because he had some animus towards the accused. (evidence has to be weighed).[14] "Related" is not equivalent to "Interested". A witness may be called "interested" only when he or she derives some benefit from the result of a litigation i.e., under a decree in a civil case or in seeing an accused person punished. A witness who is a natural one and is the only possible eye-witness in the circumstances of a case cannot be said to be interested.[15] Where the eye-witnesses were not that of the caste of the deceased nor were they in any way related to him, they could not be called interested witnesses merely because they were related to the servant engaged by the deceased.[16] A witness cannot be called an interested one simply because he is the natural father of the adopted son.[17] Where the witness was known both to the victim and the accused, his evidence would be material and could not be criticized on the ground that, as he knew the father of the accused, he was an interested witness.[18] Where a witness, along with others of the locality, chased the accused and gave a report to the police, it was held that his conduct was not extraordinary and he cannot be called an interested witness.[19] The mere fact that the witness belongs to the same caste does not necessarily make him an interested witness, much less an untrustworthy or untruthful witness. So also, the mere fact that the witness is associated with the professional work of another witness does not necessarily make the former an untruthful witness. The evidence of each witness has to be weighed at its face value, and a conclusion reached on the credibility thereof in the light of the other admitted or proved circumstances.[20] Mere living in the same compound is no proof of interestedness.[21] To call a witness, supporting the case of one of the parties against his own interest, as an interested witness will be absolutely perverse.[22] If a panch witness occupying a respectable and disinterested position voluntarily helps the investigation by acting as a panch and his evidence appears to the Court to be wholly satisfactory, he cannot be considered as a partisan witness.[23]

Evidence of a witness cannot be discarded merely on the ground of his being an interested witness as a witness normally would not leave the real culprits and rope in innocent persons,[24] particularly when no material could be elicited from his cross-examination casting doubt on his credibility and his demeanour at trial also was not such as to discard his testimony[25] or otherwise his evidence is truthworthy.[26] However his evidence is to be scrutinised with caution.[27]

Evidence is first to be scrutinised on merits before investigating whether a witness is an interested witness.[28] The evidence of interested witnesses has to be tested in the light of the probabilities and the previous statements and the surrounding circumstances.[29]

Mere fact that a witness had good neighbourly relations with the deceased is no ground to discard his evidence.[30] Similarly the evidence of the eye-witnesses could not be discarded simply because they were known to the younger brother of the deceased.[31]

The testimony of an interested witness must be viewed with a high degree of caution and the Court must also look for independent corroboration.[32] However, there is no hard and fast rule that the evidence of a partisan witness cannot be acted upon without corroboration. It can be accepted if his presence at the scene of occurrence cannot be doubted and his evidence is consistent with the surrounding circumstances and the probabilities of the case and strikes the Court as true.[33] Where the witnesses belonged to the party of the deceased, it would not be safe to rely upon their evidence without finding independent corroboration for their testimony.[34] Where none else but the interested witnesses had seen the occurrence, non-production of independent witness would not affect the prosecution case.[35]

There is no rule of law to the effect that the evidence of partisan witnesses cannot be accepted. Interested evidence is not necessarily false, but is accepted with caution.[36] Testimony of such a witness cannot be equated with that of a tainted witness but it must be examined with more care and caution.[37] His testimony cannot be disbelieved in absence of any special reason of general unreliability.[38]

Merely because in a murder case, prosecution witnesses were interested and inimical, that by itself is no ground to reject their testimony in toto. The evidence of interested witnesses should however be scrutinised with care.[39] Close relationship of the witness with the injured is not sufficient to suspect credibility and desirability subjecting the testimony of the evidence of the relatives to close and severe scrutiny arises only when it is shown that there was likelihood of an attempt to falsely implicate an accused[40] but where the incident had taken place in the broad day-light and there was no reason to falsely implicate the accused, the testimony of the interested witness could not be brushed aside.[41] The evidence of the Food Inspector cannot be rejected only on the ground of his being an interested person unless his action is proved mala fide.[42]

A witness against whom the father of the accused filed a partition suit, cannot be termed a partisan or interested witness for the prosecution.[43] Where there was a free fight between two groups, entire evidence should not be rejected on the sole ground that it is partisan evidence.[44] Where a witness sustained an injury at the time of occurrence and gave consistent version as given in the F.I.R., and the accused also admitted his presence at the scene, his evidence cannot be rejected on the ground that he is an interested witness.[45] Merely because the witnesses are interested and had animus towards the accused, their testimony could not be rejected particularly when the occurrence took place inside the house around midnight[46] and no independent witness was examined.[47]

Where the eye-witnesses to the occurrence are interested persons, their evidence can be adequately corroborated by circumstances. The credibility of a witness depends upon his knowledge of the facts he testifies, his disinterestedness, his integrity and how he has stood the test of cross-examination.[48] Where nothing could be elicited in the cross-examination of the interested witnesses, the close friends of the victims, to shake their testimony, their testimony could not be discarded merely on the ground that they resided at far off places and there was no reason of their being present at the spot at the relevant time.[49]

Where the occular version given by the interested witnesses was totally contrary to the medical evidence, it was not relied upon[50]; so also where it was uncorroborated, infirm, inconsistent and tainted with interestedness.[51]

When the injuries found on a person lend assurance to his presence at the time and place of occurrence, and the evidence has a ring of truth, it cannot be easily brushed aside on the ground of his being an interested witness, if his deposition receives ample corroboration from the medical evidence as also from the circumstantial evidence.[52] The corroborated evidence of a partisan witness can be relied upon for reversing the order of acquittal.[53] Where the testimony of the interested witnesses was corroborating with each other, it could not be rejected on the ground of interestedness.[54] Testimony of eye-witnesses cannot be discarded merely because of their being interested witnesses.[55] Where the evidence of eye-witnesses was consistent, the same could not be discarded on the ground of their being interested witnesses or the co-accused having be acquitted on self-same evidence or there being minor variations.[56]

Merely because witnesses are closely associated with or interested in the deceased, their evidence does not necessarily require corroboration before being acted upon.[57] Evidence of interested witnesses is to be considered with care and caution. The evidence of an interested witness is not like that of an approver which is presumed to be tainted and requires corroboration, but it is as good as any other evidence.[58] Evidence of eye-witnesses cannot be rejected on the ground that the prosecution party and the accused belong to two different factions, as long as their evidence is consistent and trustworthy and corroborated by medical evidence.[59] Where the evidence of the interested eye-witness was uncorroborated by any evidence and there was possibility the injuries to be fabricated, the accused was entitled to benefit of doubt as mere recovery of weapons itself is of no consequence.[60]

When the witness is an eye-witness, interested and inimical to the accused, one has to approach his evidence with some caution but it cannot be discarded merely on the ground that the evidence is of a partisan nature.[61] Where in a case of dowry death, the accused husband produced witness from his vicinity to support his defence, he, being interested to save the accused, was not relied upon.[62]

When the witness who is interested in the deceased made improvements in the prosecution case propounded by them from the time of the investigation stage, their evidence cannot be relied upon.[63] but merely the witnesses attempting to suppress their relationship with the deceased cannot by itself be fatal.[64] In the case of dacoity, the testimony of the inmates of the house cannot be disregarded as interested witnesses as the accused are strangers to them.[65]

Where there is a melee, and a large number of assailants and a number of witnesses claim to have witnessed the occurrence at different stages of the occurrence, and where the evidence is undoubtedly partisan evidence, the distinct possibility of innocent persons being falsely included along in the guilty cannot be easily ruled out. In a faction-ridden society, where an occurrence takes place in a village, the evidence would be of a partisan nature. In such a situation, to reject the entire evidence on the sole ground that it is partisan is to shut one's eyes to the realities of the rural life in our country. A large number of accused would go unpunished if such an easy course is charted. Simultaneously, it is to be borne in mind that in such a situation the easy tendency to involve as many persons of the opposite faction as possible, by merely naming them as having seen in the melee, is a tendency which is more often discernible and is to be eschewed; therefore, the evidence has to be examined with utmost care and caution.[66]

Where the offence was the outcome of faction and the eye-witnesses are interested, persons their evidence has to be examined in the light of other evidence.[67] Where plaintiff's witness was inimical towards one of the defendants, it was held that no reliance should be placed on the statement of such a witness.[68] Evidence of a solicitor on behalf of his client cannot be rejected on the ground that he is interested.[69] In an election the witnesses on either side belong to one party or the other; thus they are interested to see that their party wins the case. Their evidence however cannot be rejected merely because they are interested witnesses, where there are good grounds for accepting their evidence. Their evidence has to be scrutnised, carefully and rejected if it is tainted with falsehood.[70] Polling agent of a rival party candidate deposed that he witnessed a candidate coming with 50 or 60 persons to polling booth and telling his polling agent that he was leaving certain persons behind and the agents should see that no body voted for rival party candidate. As the witness is an interested witness his evidence does not carry any weight.[71]

(c) Independent Witness.—Examination of independent witnesses in a case is a rule of prudence, but it cannot be the rule of law, which depends on whether the independent witnesses were present and had seen the occurrence, but they are not supporting the prosecution story or that they are withheld by the prosecution.[72]

Where murder was committed in broad day-light in the vicinity of a number of houses and shops, it was the duty of the prosecution to examine independent witnesses present there and adverse inference could be drawn for non-examination of any independent witness. It was held to be fatal to the prosecution case as the witnesses examined were not reliable.[73] But the prosecution cannot be expected to examine any independent witness on the point of occurrence taking place in side a house in the late hours of night.[74] Where the Court accepted the evidence of a highly interested witness, the daughter of the deceased and rejected the contradictory evidence of two other witnesses one of whom was wholly an independent witness, the Court was grossly unjustified in doing so.[75] The evidence of the independent witness who is neither connected with the accused nor to witnesses, cannot be doubted.[76] The testimony of the independent witnesses has to pass the test of probabilities and trustworthiness.[77] Where the evidence of the independent witness was cogent and clear and stood the cross-examination, her evidence could not be discarded on the ground that she was a chance witness.[78] Where the statement of the independent witness regarding extra-judicial confession of the accused regarding his involvement in the dacoity-cum-murder case at 9 p.m. on the same day when he was called to the police station for interrogation after which he was let off with direction to come at 10 a.m. the next day, was found to be reliable and free from any contradiction, it could not be rejected merely on the ground that the accused was not arrested during the same night.[79] Where the evidence of natural and independent witness was corroborated by the presence of injuries on the person of the victim, his testimony could not be rejected.[80] In a case involving police raid and search, it was held that acquaintance of the independent witness with the police and the fact that he helped the police in the action would not by itself discredit his evidence.[81] Where in a case of recovery of contraband under the N.D. & P.S. Act, the only independent witness joined by the prosecution consistently denied the recovery of the contraband, recovery consequent to the disclosure statement of the accused could not be relied upon.[82] On the other hand, the evidence of the independent witness given up by the prosecution coming up as a defence witness, could not be discarded on the sole ground of his joining hands with the defence.[83] Where the evidence of eye-witnesses was found creditworthy, non-examination of independent persons does not affect the prosecution case more so when the incident had taken place suddenly and the people in the nearby shops might not have seen the actual attack and might not have known the assailants as they belonged to another village.[84] Turning hostile of the independent witnesses itself cannot be a ground for the acquittal of the accused.[85]

The evidence of the owner of the shop, the place of occurrence, cannot be dubbed as evidence of an interested and partisan witness as he was an independent witness without any motive to falsely implicate the accused persons.[86] Where the witness who was examined by the accused was not shown by the accused to be interested in prosecution and inimical to him, he must be held to be disinterested witness.[87]

(d) Child witness.—See Commentary under head "Child Witness" in Section 118.

(e) Women witness.—In a case where the witnesses are women the fact that the lives of a number of accused depend on their testimony, is not a valid reason to say that corroboration is necessary to act on their evidence.[88]

In the absence of any substantial discrepancy evidence of women witnesses in a rural area cannot be discarded.[89]

(f) Rustic witness.—The testimony of an ignorant and rustic woman hailing from country side cannot be judged by the same standard of exactitude and consistency as that of an urban sophisticated witness. Such an evidence has necessarily to be tested on an anvil of objective circumstances of the case.[90] Slight discrepancies in the statements of eye-witnesses are not uncommon in the testimony of most truthful witnesses. They indicate truth rather than falsehood of their version. Village people have little ideas of time and distance. The evidence of village folk cannot be taken with an exactitude regarding time and distance.[91]

(g) Police and other officers.—VENKATARAMA IYER J. stated[92] that the presumption that a person acts honestly applies as much in favour of a police officer as of other persons, and it is not a judicial approach to distrust and suspect him without good grounds there for.[93] The statements of the police witnesses are entitled to the same weight and the same consideration which is attached to the statement of a member of the public. It must inspire confidence to be relied upon.[94] Where no independent witness was available and other witnesses had turned hostile, the evidence of the police witnesses, being reliable, could form basis of conviction.[1] The statement of the police officer that he failed to examine the wife of the deceased on the day of occurrence as she was weeping, was held to be perfectly plausible.[2] The evidence of the Senior Police Officers that on examination of the case diary prepared by the I.O. and after interrogation of some of the accused, they found them innocent, could not be taken into consideration. The Court cannot rely on investigation or the result thereof.[3]

No general rule can be laid down that an Investigating Officer's evidence cannot be relied upon unless it is corroborated; it depends on the facts of each case.[4] The mere fact that the prosecution witnesses are police officers is not enough to discard their evidence in the absence of their hostility to the accused.[5] In a case where the police officer gave evidence regarding the meetings held by a candidate in an election petition, under the Representation of Peoples Act, it was held by the Supreme Court that it can not be a reason to disregard that evidence.[6] Where the investigating officer recovered weapons at the instance of the accused, and recovery memos were attested by police officers and also independent search witnesses, and only police officers were examined to prove the search, and other independent witnesses were not examined, it was held by the Supreme Court that this by itself did not introduce any serious infirmity in the evidence furnished by the recoveries, which at best were only corroborative pieces of evidence.[7]

Non-examination of such material witness as the Investigating Officer is a serious omission which cannot but throw suspicion on the whole prosecution case.[8] An accused is entitled to know from the Investigating Officer what witnesses have been examined in the course of investigation, whether the witnesses examined in the Court were examined by him or not, what story the witnesses told before him and whether same is consistent with the evidence given before the Court. Non-examination of the I.O. in this case also is a serious omission on the prosecution.[9] Where out of witnesses the named in the F.I.R. some of the witnesses had not been examined and those examined had not supported the case of the prosecution and further there was material contradiction in the evidence of the witnesses examined as regards the manner or occurrence and the weapons used by the accused, the Court observed :[10] "Non-examination of the Investigating Officer is a serious lapse on the part of the prosecuting agency....." Non-examination of the Investigating Officer is a serious lacuna. Adequate explanation for his non-production in the Court has not been given. Even the case diary has not been proved on the record and in the circumstance it has rightly been urged that serious prejudice has been caused to the accused.[11] If Investigating Officer is not examined, prejudice to the accused as claimed by the defence has to be considered and looked into and even after perusal of the diary the element of prejudice persists, benefit should be given to the accused, of course depending upon the facts and circumstances of each case.[12]

The Patna High Court has observed[13] : "During the recent times, it has been noticed that the Court has to face tremendous difficulties in procuring the attendance of the Investigating Officer for the reasons that they are transferred frequently and the sessions trial is taken up after some delay from the time when the investigation had been completed in the case. The problem has to be faced in case the I.O. is dead or he retires from service and in the case of the later in spite of prolonged adjournments the evidence is not proceeded." In another case a Division Bench of Patna High Court observed :[14] "True, non-examination of investigating officer is not fatal to the prosecution. A Court has to see whether the evidence of the Investigating Officer is essential for the case of the prosecution to succeed or not. The Court has to see at the same-time that accused is not harassed and unless it sees that for inevitable reasons the prosecution fails to produce the Investigating Officer, it may pronounce the judgment without the evidence of the Investigating Officer." Where there was no demonstrable prejudice likely to be caused to the accused rather there was only apprehension of prejudice and supposed unfairness by non-examination of the Investigating Officer, it was held that otherwise reliable and trustworthy evidence could not be discarded merely on that ground.[15] Where there was no contradiction between the statements of the prosecution witnesses given in the Court and that of earlier ones made before the Investigating Officer and they were not cross-examined regarding their earlier statements, non-examination of the I.O. was not fatal.[16] Absolutely, no contradiction has been pointed out and thus no case of prejudice has been made out in the absence of the examination of the I.O. and therefore, his non-examination cannot be said to have prejudiced the defence to the extent that the allegation directed against the appellant has to be rejected.[17] Non-examination of the I.O. is of no consequence when the defence has failed to shake the credibility of the eye-witnesses or to point out any material contradiction in the prosecution case.[18]

Under the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, the Food Inspector and the Sanitary Inspector cannot be treated as interested witnesses. Their being concerned with investigation and prosecution of offenders, which are their essential duties, does not exclude them from the category of competent witnesses.[19]

Where there was no animosity of the accused persons with the Police Inspector brought to the notice of the Court and he made no suggestion that the recoveries persuant to the statements of the accused were hoisted by him, it would be safe to believe his uncorroborated statement in respect of the recoveries.[20] Where the finding of the Excise Sub-Inspector that the seized illicit distilled liquor was based on blue litmus and hydrometer test, the unsubstantiated plea that he had grudge against the accused was not sufficient to discredit otherwise credible witness, though uncorroborated by an unofficial witness.[21] The evidence of the Intelligence Officer who had searched and arrested the accused under the N.D. & P.S. Act that the accused was informed about his right to be searched in the presence of a Gazetted Officer or Magistrate was found reliable and it was irrelevant that that officer after 10 years was found involved in a corruption case and it does not render her evidence inadmissible.[22] Where the police constables were not authorised to seize the contraband, it was held to be extremely hazardous to place reliance of their evidence, uncorroborated by that of independent witnesses.[23] There being discrepancy in the depositions of the two police officers as to the number of cartridges recovered and the independent witnesses, though available, having not be examined, such a discrepancy would not inspire confidence about the reliability of the prosecution case.[24]

(h) Stock witness.—Where the evidence of the witnesses lacked credibility and one of them admitted to have given evidence in favour of police 23 times, meaning thereby he was a stock witness and there was no other evidence to connect the accused with the crime, he was entitled to acquittal.[25] Where the investigating officer has taken pliable witnesses as panch witnesses knowingly, the entire raid would become suspect and evidence of police witnesses by themselves would not be sufficient to base a conviction.[26]

(m) Poor, illiterate witness.—Fabric of truth should be the guiding factor, and not the village or rustic background of the witness.[27] The question of weight to be attached to a particular piece of evidence is a matter on which decided cases cannot be of much help. The weight of the testimony of a witness does not depend upon his social strata. The Supreme Court did not approve the rejection of the evidence of a poor teacher or a peon. The fact that the eye-witnesses are day labourers and landless, does not by itself make their evidence unreliable.[28] Respectability and veracity of a witness is not necessarily dependent upon the status in life. It is not proper to presume that persons holding clerical posts cannot act as independent witnesses.[29] Birth is a matter independent of the volition of a person, and simply because birth takes place in a particular community, it is not a circumstance either in favour of or against the evidence of that person. Evidence has to be judged on merits, and it does not matter whether the witness is a poor or wealthy person.[30]

The evidence of illiterate and ignorant eye-witness shall not be rejected on the ground that they are minor contradictions in the evidence.[31] The fact that a witness is illiterate should not induce the Court to ignore the infirmities in his evidence and to fill the lacuna in the prosecution case. There is a limit to extend the benefit of illiteracy to such a witness.[32]

The expression 'Respectable inhabitants of the locality' under Section 103 Cr.P.C. means that the person selected by the police to act as a witness should be absolutely unprejudiced and uninterested. Once having been a prosecution witness, is not sufficient to deprive one of one's title to respectability.[33]

The Courts should not indulge in hair-splitting of the evidence of any witness much less the evidence of rustic witnesses. It must be borne in mind that these witnesses are not familiar with the subtilities of the language employed in the court, where they are in an artificial surrounding.[34] Persons from villages, most of whom are illiterate and ignorant, who figure as witnesses, try, while giving truthful evidence, to supply some answer or the other to questions put in cross-examination for fear that their inability to give an answer would be put down to their lack of knowledge of the incident of which they were giving evidence, and thus they have an adverse reflection on their truthfulness. That is why some care has to be taken by Courts of law in scrutinising as well as appreciating and assessing the value to be attached to the evidence given by such witnesses.[35] The witnesses from the villages are usually ignorant about the dates and months. So, if one such witness says that the occurrence took place in BAISAKH month, it cannot discredit the prosecution case that the offence took place in JESTA month.[36] Villagers generally do not keep clocks or watches. And so they may not be able to give a correct idea of time. Therefore, when there is some little variance in chair evidence, regarding the exact time of occurrence, it cannot be taken as a discrepancy.[37] It is not usual for Adibasis to disclose the occurrence until they are questioned by the police, because it is their natural tendency. That cannot be a ground for not giving credence to their evidence.[38] Where the evidence was of witnesses who were mostly illiterate, it was held that their evidence as to the time and date cannot be expected to be arithmetically correct and therefore, cannot be discarded.[39]

(n) Habitual Criminal—Previous Convict.—A previous convict can testify.[40] A witness was convicted 43 years ago. His testimony was not allowed to be rejected on that ground alone.[41] The mere fact that a prosecution witness was convicted for an offence of dacoity does not render his evidence unbelievable when he had been acquitted in appeal. The fact that the police subsequently initiated proceedings against him for good behaviour under Section 108, Cr.P.C., would also not justify total rejection of his evidence.[42] Where a witness stated that the accused sold goods to him, his testimony cannot be disregarded merely on the ground that he was a habitual receiver of stolen property.[43]

The evidence of a public servant should not be discarded as unreliable merely because he was previously suspended.[44]

(o) Eye witness.—The Court cannot proceed on the hypothesis that eye-witnesses are implicitly reliable. Every piece of evidence has to be subjected to the test of objectivity.[45]

In assessing the value of the evidence of an eye-witness the two principal considerations are: (i) whether, in the circumstances of the case, it is possible to believe his presence at the scene of occurrence or in such situations as would make it possible for him to witness the fact deposed by him and (ii) whether there is anything inherently improbable or unreliable in his evidence.[46] Where the eye-witnesses were most natural witnesses, giving benefit of doubt to one accused and acquitting him would not affect the evidence of those witnesses.[47] Absence of test identification parade by itself is not fatal and ipso facto it does not bring discredit to the claim of witnesses. Eye account is to be appreciated taking into account the attending and other circumstances.[48] Where the presence of the eye-witnesses on the spot was found to be natural and there was nothing to show that they were deposing falsely, their testimony could not be discarded even though they had bad antecedents.[49]

Ordinarily, the evidence of a truthful eye-witness is sufficient without anything more, to warrant a conviction, and it cannot be made to depend for its acceptance on the truthfulness of other items of evidence, such as recovery of weapons etc., at the instance of the accused by the police. The evidence of the eye-witness, if accepted, is sufficient to warrant a conviction, though in appropriate cases the Court may, as a measure of caution, require some confirming circumstances by way of corroboration;[50] where it is not fully satisfied regarding the credibility of a witness.[51] Where the testimony of the eye-witnesses is clear, cogent and creditworthy, non-explanation of some minor injuries on the person of the accused, not certainly received in the same transaction, does not affect the prosecution case.[52]

Where the eye-witness succeeded escaping unhurt from the scene of occurrence and there were some discrepancies in their statements, it was held that there was no ground for holding that they were not eye-witnesses, when their evidence on material particulars was satisfactory.[53] The presence of the eye-witness on the scene of occurrence cannot be doubted merely because they saw lesser number of blows being dealt than actually found on the person of the victim.[54]

Where no explanation of the bleeding wound on the head of the accused was given by the eye-witnesses, it was held to be sufficient for acquittal.[55] Where the defence failed to explain how the eye-witnesses sustained injuries, conviction was not interfered with.[56] Where the evidence is of the only witness to connect the accused with the crime and when the witness gives different version in the Committing Court and in the Sessions Court, it would be a good ground for acquitting the accused.[57] The fact that the police had asked the eye-witnesses to affix their finger impressions on the statements made by them at the inquest, cannot cast any doubt on the reliability of their evidence.[58]

It is not safe to base the conviction on the sole evidence of an eye-witness unless some corroboration is found in the other evidence or material record.[59] As regards the safety in convicting an accused on the evidence of a single witness there is no computerised rule. Nor are the judges computers. It must always depend on the circumstances of each case and the quality of the evidence of the single witness whose testimony has to be either accepted or rejected.[60] Where the sole eye-witness, who was the brother of the deceased, stated that the hands of the deceased were bound forcibly by the accused and shot dead, and the medical evidence by the doctor was that he did not note or find any imprint of a rope on the wrist of the dead body, it was held by the Supreme Court, that it was hardly a ground for rejecting the evidence of the eye-witness.[61] Where the evidence of the sole eye-witness was found be infirm, accused was entitled to acquittal.[62]

It is not proper for the Court to disregard the evidence of important eye-witnesses on general grounds or broad probabilities, without examining the intrinsic merits of their evidence.[63] Where the deceased and the injured witnesses had taken shelter in a house in whose roof the accused numbering 13 or 14 variously armed forming an unlawful assembly made a big hole and attacked the victims and the witnesses failed to give consistent and detailed account of their injuries and made improvements, the same was held to be no ground to acquit the accused.[64] The evidence of an eye-witness cannot be disregarded only on the ground that he did not intervene to save the deceased.[65] Evidence of eye-witness cannot be discarded on the basis of vague evidence of the other witness who was subsequently treated as hostile.[66] Where the presence of eye-witnesses at the place of occurrence was proved, their evidence could not be disbelieved merely because they happened to be relation of the deceased.[67] An eye-witness cannot be disbelieved merely because he has not been examined by the prosecution or that he had not given any statement to the police[68] before he was examined in the case.[69] In the face of evidence of eye-witnesses mere suspicion that the grandson of the deceased had the motive to commit the offence as he wanted to get the property of the deceased old woman was held not sufficient to discredit the eye-witnesses.[70]

When the version of the eye-witness was corroborated by the report of forensic expert about the cartridge, and the motive behind the offence was found to be strong, it was held that the accused was liable to be convicted.[71] The corroborated evidence of eye-witnesses cannot be discarded merely because of some contradictions in their depositions.[72] Evidence of eye-witnesses who stood the test of cross-examination and were trustworthy, could not be discarded on the ground that another witness had given inconsistent version with it[73] or that they were of bad character.[74] Where the evidence of eye-witness is in accord with medical evidence and corroborated by recovery of weapons of attack at the instance of the accused, there is no reason to disbelieve his evidence.[75] Where the medical evidence noted lacerated wounds and abrasions on the dead body; it was held that as the witnesses stated that the deceased was struck with the lathi portion of the spears, there is no inconsistency between the ocular and medical evidence; that mere non-mention, in the F.I.R., that the lathi portion was used, was immaterial, as they had stated during investigation that the lathi portion was used.[76] In case of inconsistency of evidence of eye-witnesses with the medical evidence, their evidence should not be rejected in toto. The Court is duty bound to scrutinise their evidence carefully and accept the acceptable evidence.[77] In a criminal case the medical evidence is a very safe yardstick for measuring the veracity of the occular account. If it corroborates the same, unless it suffers from some inherent improbabilities or intrinsic infirmities it would, ordinarily, be accepted by the Court. On the converse, if it is belied by the medical evidence in the absence of some in-built guarantees which demonstrate the truthfulness of the prosecution case, like the spot arrest of the accused persons, the Court normally would be loath to accept it.[78] If the High Court thought it unsafe to convict any of the accused on the uncorroborated evidence of a single eye-witness, it does not mean that the evidence of the witness stands castigated. It is no stigma against the evidence of any eye-witness if the Court only wanted re-assurance from other sources.[79] Where the accused was prosecuted for hunting and killing a bison in a forest area, it was held that the evidence of a forest officer can be relied on without corroboration.[80]

The ocular version of a person injured in the same incident is of great value.[81]

It is always advisable to test the evidence of a witness on the anvil of objective circumstances in the case.[82]

Where an eye-witness to a murder kept silent as to the occurrence out of fear and later gave statement under Section 164 Cr.P.C. only after being questioned by the police, without any undue pressure, and maintained the same in his deposition before the Court, it was held that his statement need not be looked at with suspicion, and separate corroboration is also not necessary.[83] Evidence of the eyewitness cannot be rejected on the ground that she did not give details of occurrence in her evidence under Sections 161 and 164 Cr.P.C.[84] Where evidence of the eye-witness was found to be totally reliable and sufficient to prove the guilt of the accused beyond doubt, it cannot be rendered to be unreliable for not disclosing the names of assailants in her earlier version or be discarded for her failure to mention the source of light enabling her to identify the assailants or that she was adolescent.[85] Where the witness, who knew that the deceased had gone to the place of the accused on the day of murder, did not disclose this fact when he was informed about the disappearance of the deceased, his evidence could not be discarded only on that ground as people do not want to get embroiled in such cases.[86] In a case where a person has witnessed the crime but did not give information, there should be corroboration of the material part of the story connecting the accused with a crime as will satisfy reasonable minds that the man can be regarded as a truthful witness.[87] Where an eye-witness did not come forward and tell the Investigating Officer, but gave evidence long after in Court, it was held that his omission to inform the Investigating Officer condemns his testimony as an after thought.[88] Where the eye-witness disclosed the incident to police seven days after the incident and when the long delay was not explained, his testimony cannot be accepted.[89] Where the eye-witness, the mother of the deceased, who claimed to have witnessed the accused assaulting somebody through a hole in the door did not divulge the fact to anybody even after she was told that it was her son that was killed by the accused and when her statement was recorded by the investigating officer, a week after the offence, it was held that her evidence could not be relied.[90] Where the eye-witness were tortured and assaulted by the Investigating Officer, their evidence could not form the basis of conviction.[91]

Failure of the eye-witness to identify the accused, is a serious lacuna in his evidence.[92] Where the eye-witness failed to identify one of the nine accused persons, benefit of doubt should go to that one accused and not to others.[93] Where the only eye-witness committed error in identifying the accused and the extra-judicial confession was found not worthy of belief, it was held that the uncorroborated evidence of the sole witness is itself not sufficient to warrant the conviction.[94] Where none of the witnesses gave any description of the dacoits in their statements to the police or in oral evidence nor gave any identification marks such as stature, whether they were fat or thin, or fair or black in colour and when only one witness identified the dacoits after sometime in the identification parade, it was held that conviction cannot be based only on the identification by a single witness.[95] Where in case of docoity with murder, the evidence of the eye-witness account was highly improbable, inconsistent and uncorroborated by medical or independent evidence, conviction of the accused was held to be liable to set aside.[96] Where it was found that the eye-witness put pressure on the victim to prosecute the accused and the medical evidence did not support the prosecution case, it was held that the eye-witness cannot be said to an independent witness and his evidence cannot be relied upon.[97] Veracity of an eye-witness cannot be doubted on the ground that no independent witnesses from the nearby place were examined by the prosecution.[98] Where the sole alleged eye-witness of murder, a close relative of the deceased, made no attempt to save him and his statement about the time of occurrence was contradictory to the medical evidence, his evidence could not be relied upon without some independent corroboration.[1] Assuming that the eye-witness tried to improve his evidence in a case, with a view to falling in line with the wound mahazar by adding a third stab, that by itself is no good reason to discard his entire testimony as against the accused. So much of his evidence as is corroborated by other direct evidence or circumstances can be acted upon.[2] The veracity of the evidence of the eye-witness, fully corroborated by the evidence of the independent witness, cannot be doubted only on the ground the brother of the accused once lost election against him.[3]

Where an eye-witness gave a dramatic account of the incident with minute details of attack on each victim, but admitted in the cross-examination that he was also attacked simultaneously, it was held such evidence of the eye-witness cannot be relied on.[4]

Where there was contradiction between the medical evidence and the sole eye-witness regarding the fatal injuries, it was held that the medical evidence is to be accepted and the accused is entitled for an acquittal.[5] But where the evidence of eye-witnesses is unimpeachable, it should be preferred to the hypothetical answers given by the Medical Officer.[6] Where direct evidence is cogent, reliable and unimpeachable, the medical evidence cannot override.[7] Where the medical evidence is totally in conflict with the oral evidence of the eye-witnesses and the medical officer asserted that the injuries could have been caused only by a stabbing instrument and not by a weapon like 'Aruval', as deposed by the eye-witnesses, it was held that the evidence of eye-witnesses cannot be relied upon as no clarification is obtained from any experienced expert doctor and the accused was entitled to the benefit of doubt.[8]

Where the eye-witness was found to have been fully intoxicated and was not in his sense, it was held that such evidence of the eye-witness cannot be relied.[9] Where the testimony of the eye-witness was clouded with grave suspicion and discrepancy in material particulars, it was unsafe to record conviction on his testimony.[10] Where the complainant reported the dacoity in his house at night, giving identification of the accused in the light of a torch focused by the accused but, in the court, he stated that he identified them in the light of the lantern, it was held that his evidence is unreliable.[11] Where both the eye-witnesses were victims of an assault, it was held that their evidence cannot be discarded on the ground of slight discrepancy regarding the number of lathi blows given by the accused on the deceased.[12] Where there is no serious discrepancy between the testimony of the eye-witness and the facts given in the F.I.R., regarding time, place, and the manner of occurrence including the name of the assailant, and the evidence of the eye-witness was corroborated by medical evidence, it was held that the witness was reliable and the small discrepancy does not warrant rejection of his evidence.[13] The evidence of eye-witnesses as regards time of occurrence of the incident and that of the doctor as regards the time of death, cannot be discarded merely on a theoretical consideration of the process of digestion of food.[14] The evidence of the eye-witness otherwise found reliable could not be rejected merely on the ground that the said eye-witness lodged the F.I.R. the next morning.[15] Where the two eye-witnesses contradicted each other on material particulars of the offence, and their subsequent behaviour was also abnormal, it was held that conviction based on their evidence could not be sustained.[16]

Where the eye-witness informed the parents of the deceased about the occurrence, and the F.I.R., was also lodged on the basis of his information, his evidence could not be rejected.[17] An otherwise truthful and reliable evidence of eye-witness cannot be discarded on the only ground that they were interested witness.[18] The evidence of the eye-witnesses, the close relatives of the victims of murder shocked seeing the dastardly attacks on them, could not be discarded for their statement were taken in piecemeal here and there.[19] Where nothing could be elicited in the cross-examination of the eye-witnesses to impeach their testimony, it could not be discarded merely on the ground of their being relatives of the deceased.[20]

Where the prosecution had proved its case through other evidence and by surrounding circumstances, the turning hostile of the eye-witness cannot demolish prosecution version nor can it be said that the Investigating Officer had not acted impartially in investigating the offence and collecting the evidence.[21]

Non-examination of eye-witness.—Where the informant/elder brother of deceased, an eye-witness to the occurrence was not examined by the prosecution and he did not mention that incident to anyone, which was not natural, his evidence did not inspire confidence.[22]

(p) Injured witness.—Omissions in the testimony of an injured witness are material only when they amount to contradictions that militate against the meat or core of the prosecution.[23] Where the evidence of injured eye-witness is cogent and acceptable, it cannot be rejected for little discrepancies[24] and also where it is corroborated.[25] There is no immutable rule that evidence of injured witness should be mechanically accepted.[26] Before the evidence of an injured witness can be accepted, the Court should be satisfied that he is a truthful witness and the account furnished by him is in consonance with probabilities.[27] Simply because the injured witness failed to identify the co-accused due to darkness, his identification of the accused who was already known to him and who gave him the dagger-blow, could not be doubted.[28] The witness who himself received injuries of serious nature during assault would not normally let go the real culprits.[29] Where the injured eye-witness stated that after witnessing the incident, he developed fear and went to his mother-in-law's place and did not disclose the commission of the offence to the Investigating Officer, the said conduct of his does not falsify his evidence as people are scared to figure as witnesses.[30] Evidence of injured eye-witnesses cannot be rejected merely on the ground that they were interested witnesses[31] and were not examined.[32] There is no justification in drawing a hiatus between injured witnesses and non-injured witnesses for the capacity to identify the assailants while in action.[33] Where the investigating agency failed to seize the blood-stained clothes of the witness who helped the injured to reach the hospital, it was held to be no ground to infer that he did not see the occurrence.[34] Injuries on the person of a witness at the best may ensure his presence at the scene of occurrence, however his truthfulness has to be ascertained to the satisfaction of the Court.[35] Where the version of the injured and independent witnesses clearly revealed the incident and role played by the accused and there was nothing to show their interestedness, their version was held reliable.[36] The testimony of an injured witness inspiring confidence can be sufficient for sustaining the finding of conviction.[37]

Where the injured witness shifted his stand regarding the identity of the accused, place of occurrence and number of other facts from the statements recorded by the police, his statement could not be treated as simple and straightforward and was not reliable.[38]

(q) Chance Witness.—If, by co-incidence or chance, a person happens to be at the place of occurrence at the time it is taking place, he is called a chance witness. If murder is committed in a street, only passers-by will be witnesses. Their evidence cannot be brushed aside or viewed with suspicion on the ground that they are mere 'chance witnesses'.

A chance witness is a witness who should not normally be where and when he professes to have been; from that point of view one may be a chance witness even at one's own house if, for instance, one should at that hour have been in one's office. Even a person in the desolation of Sahara may not be a chance witness if his being there and then was on his itinerary.[39] Where the witness belonging to another village stated his presence near the place of occurrence but did not state the fact regarding the alleged assault on the deceased by the accused, he could not be said to be a chance witness.[40]

When the evidence is that of a chance witness, such evidence would necessarily require corroboration by independent evidence.[41] Evidence of chance witnesses, corroborated and without any material contradictions or infirmity found to be truthful and reliable, could not be set aside on the ground of their being chance witnesses.[42] When the occurrence was not very late in the night, though people would not be passing on the road in the village, the evidence of the witnesses who had given reasons as to why they were there could not be discarded by merely dubbing them as chance witnesses.[43] Unless evidence of witnesses is otherwise assailable, it cannot be whittled down merely on the ground that they are chance witnesses.[44]

In the case of dowry death due to burn injuries, the sister of the deceased and her father-in-law who lived in the opposite house who rushed to the house and witnessed the incident of burning are natural witnesses.[45] When the presence of an eye-witness at the place of occurrence was established and others came there as a result of his cries for help and, it was he who lodged the complaint within minutes of the occurrence, it would indicate that the eye-witness was not a chance witness.[46] Where a witness had no particular work in any of his fields, but went from one field to another he cannot be considered as a chance witness, as it is for a person owning more than one field to visit all his fields on a particular day, to give instructions to the workmen.[47] The house of the witness being near the place of occurrence, he is not a chance witness.[48] When an incident takes place in broad day light, different persons who follow their respective avocations are likely to come accross incidents which, in the ordinary course, they never contemplated to see.[49] Persons present at a bus stand to catch a bus when the accused was apprehended and opium was recovered from him, cannot be said to be chance witnesses.[50] A person who attended the chamber of an advocate who advised the preparation of a will, when, the offence took place, cannot be called a chance witness.[51] Where a witness went to the house of the deceased and then followed him to the spot of occurrence, his evidence cannot be thrown out by characterising him as a chance witness.[52] When the occurrence took place in agricultural land, due to land disputes, during the ploughing hours in the morning, and the witness was fishing in the nearby drain and another witness was ploughing his land which was near the place of occurrence, their evidence could not be discarded on the ground that they are chance witnesses.[53] Where a 'halla' takes place, people come to see its occurrence. It is not proper to reject the evidence of such people as chance witnesses.[54]

If a person by chance happens to be at the place of occurrence at the time of its taking place, and if such person happens to be a relative or friend of the victim or is inimically disposed towards the accused, then his being a chance witness is viewed with suspicion. Such a piece of evidence is not necessarily incredible or unbelievable, but does require caution and close scrutiny.[55] The mere fact that an attesting witness of a will is a chance witness, is no ground for disbelieving his evidence. Though it is usual for witness to be called when a person is intending to execute a will, there is nothing improvable in taking advantage of the accidental presence of witnesses in that connection.[56]

Though a chance witness is not necessarily a false witness, it is proverbially rash to rely upon such witness.[57]

(r) Natural witness.—The witnesses, the sister and the father-in-law of the deceased, living in the house opposite to that of the deceased and entering her house by breaking open the gate of the compound and witnessing the incident, are natural witnesses and are to be believed.[58]

(s) Staff Member.—Where the witnesses were the staff members/employees of the Bank working under the accused Branch Manager, their evidence could not be brushed aside only on that ground.[59]

(t) Witnesses of Locality.—Where the evidence adduced by the prosecution is found to be reliable, non-examination of the witnesses of locality does not by itself render the conviction unsustainable.[60]

21. WITNESS AGAINST ONESELF

The evidence of specimen handwriting, finger prints, blood or hairs will incriminate an accused only if on comparison with certain other handwritings, finger prints, blood or sample of hairs, identity between the two sets is established. By themselves they do not incriminate an accused. Again by themselves they are of no assistance at all to establish the charge against an accused. Thus by taking the sample of hairs of the accused for comparison with the hairs of the assailant found in the hand of the deceased, he does not thereby become witness against himself.[61]

22. CIRCUMSTANCES ADVERSE TO WITNESS

It is a settled law that no circumstance can be read adverse to the witness or the case of the prosecution unless that is put to the concerned witness and his explanation is obtained.[62]

23. NUMBER OF WITNESSES

Even if a case against the accused hangs on the evidence of a single eye-witness it may be enough to sustain the conviction given on sterling testimony of a competent, honest man, although, as a rule of prudence, courts call for corroboration. Witnesses have to be weighed and not counted since the quality matters more than quantity in human affairs.[63]

The Supreme Court has held that the fact, that the prosecution is able to examine only one eye-witness to the occurrence cannot detract from the strength of its case; what is important is not how many witnesses are examined by the prosecution, but what is the nature and quality of evidence on which it relies.[64] The evidence of a single witness, may sustain a sentence to death, whereas a host of vulnerable witnesses may fail to support a simple charge of hurt.[65] The testimony of solitary eye-witness should be wholly reliable.[66] Conviction can be based on the wholly reliable testimony of a sole witness.[67] If the evidence of the witness is partly reliable and partly unreliable, it cannot be relied upon, unless it is corroborated in material particulars, by reliable evidence[68]; so also where the solitary eye-witness was highly interested, inimical to the accused and the identification of the accused was doubtful.[69]

See also commentary under Section 134.

24. INJURIES ON THE PERSON OF THE ACCUSED

Failure to explain the injuries on the person of the accused by the prosecution is not always fatal[70] and the whole case does not become doubtful thereby.[71] Where there was no proof that the injuries on the person of the accused were caused in the very incident in which the murder was committed, prosecution is not bound to explain them.[72]

25. INJURIES ON THE VICTIM'S BODY

Where the fracture of the ribs had no corresponding external injuries on the victim's body, it could be due to violent fall also and not only due to blows with blunt weapons.[73] Non-explanation of injuries on the person of the accused assumes greater importance where evidence consists of interested or inimical witnesses or where defence gives a version which competes with that of prosecution but where evidence is clear, cogent and trustworthy and where the Court can separate truth from falsehood, it itself cannot be a sole basis to reject such evidence, and consequently the whole case.[74] Where the alleged eye-witness was absolutely silent about one of the two massive injuries sustained by the deceased and there was no explanation of that injury in the prosecution evidence, it was held to be not safe to rely on the account furnished by the said witness.[75]

26. APPRECIATION OF EVIDENCE

In a country like India, it is difficult to find a witness who has not made any embellishment or exaggeration and, therefore, the Court would be justified in separating the chaff from the grain and then act upon the grain. But where the evidence consists of only chaff, the question of separating the chaff from the grain would not arise. In the present case all the eye-witnesses suffered infirmities.[76]

The Court has to decide on the basis of the evidence adduced before it by the parties whether the guilt of the accused is made out beyond reasonable doubt and whether, in a civil case, on a balance of probabilities, the plaintiff has made out a case for relief. The governing principle is known as that of "standard of proof". Appreciation of evidence is a very difficult and delicate task. A testimony without a fringe or embroidery of untruth is rare. The Court can reject it only when it is tainted to the core, that is, where falsehood and truth are inextricably intertwined. If this is not so, the Court must separate the grain from the chaff.[77] Where the story told by the witnesses in the Court was consistent with the medical evidence and the contents of the F.I.R., it warranted implicit reliance, notwithstanding different statements were obtained by the police under S. 162, Cr.P.C.[78] The reliable and corroborated testimony of the first informant on whose testimony the formal F.I.R. was registered could not be discredited on account of mere acquittal of some of the accused nominated by him as being present along with the convicted accused at the time of occurrence.[79] Where in the F.I.R. it was stated that the assailants assaulted the deceased with 'Kanta' and 'Kulhari' without stating that the back side of the weapons also fell on the victim and the informant witness stated in the Court that the assailants hit the victim with blunt side of the weapons, it cannot be said to be a material inconsistency in his testimony and his evidence could not be discarded as it was not possible to ascertain the same where the attacks were in quick succession[80] but where the witness testified that the victim wife was subjected to cruelty by her husband and in-laws, but no such version was given by him during investigation, it was unsafe to rely upon such testimony.[81] The Courts and tribunals have to judge the evidence before them by applying the test of human probabilities.[82]

Law does not make any distinction in the matter of appreciation of evidence in a case under TADAA or under normal criminal law.[83] Where there was hostility between the deceased and accused and all the members of the family of the deceased were interested in implicating them and the prosecution evidence suffered from fairly serious infirmities, conviction and sentence was set aside.[84]

Witnesses are expected to depose what they have seen and heard and not to draw inference from what they see. The privilege of drawing inferences is given to Courts and not to witnesses.[85]

Where the prosecution had examined the lone independent witness available, the evidence showed that no other independent witness was available whom the prosecution did not examine and the accused also in his counter-case did not mention about any outsider being present and seeing the incident, no adverse could be drawn against the prosecution on that ground.[86]

Where the facts which the prosecution themselves do not controvert in the witness-box are found to accord with the accused's story, the Court should not overlook such facts.[87] Where the prosecution witness stated that the disputed land has been in the possession of the accused for a number of years, there was no reason to disbelieve him. He was not treated as a hostile witness.[88]

The mere fact that out of many accused some are acquitted is not sufficient to entail the rejection of the entire prosecution case.[89] It is a settled law that witnesses can be believed in part and disbelieved in part. Disbelieving a witness against the co-accused can be no ground for the acquittal of the accused.[90] Where the Investigating Officer did not produce the injury report of the accused, it was held that he conducted the investigation in a tainted and partisan manner.[91]

Presence of the accused in the hospital where the deceased was admitted with burn injuries cannot absolve him because it can also be for eliminating all suspicion against him.[92]

Where the witness whose testimony was essential for unfolding the narrative was not examined for which no explanation was given, the prosecution case stood vitiated.[93] Court would be perfectly justified in brushing aside the evidence of the prosecution witnesses who apparently are not truthful witnesses, besides being very inimically disposed towards the accused[94] but where there was clinching oral and documentary evidence establishing the scene of occurrence, the mere fact that the blood-stained earth was not sent for chemical examination, was no ground to doubt the scene of occurrence and reject the prosecution story.[95]

Evidence of untruthful witness cannot be utilised to discredit another witness.[1]

It is a well-settled law that evidence may be accepted partially or in the whole and where there are certain infirmities, the evidence would be of restrictive use.[2] Merely because a portion of the evidence of a witness is found to be not acceptable, the whole of his evidence cannot be rejected[3] and partially acceptable oral evidence can be used to the limited extent of filling in the gaps in the prosecution evidence.[4] Evidence of witness should be read as a whole when a comparison is made with that of another.[5]

In a criminal trial, the whole of the evidence in chief and cross-examination has to be read together to find out the truth therefrom. Mere reading of a portion of the cross-examination, ignoring the chief examination, would be misleading, particularly in a case of murder.[6] Where in a cross-criminal complaint, only the complainant and the other person who himself was accused in the complaint by the complainant, were examined, both being interested witnesses, non-examination of any other material eye-witness, was fatal for the prosecution story.[7] Where there was no complaint about torture by the victim wife but there was evidence that she was subjected to torture, the evidence was not reliable.[8] The deposition that the two accused were having guns and the witness identified them by flashing torch towards them at a distances of 8-10 paces was held to be unreliable as the accused/robbers did no harm to the witness whereas they shot dead the neighbour of the person in whose house they were committing robbery allegedly at dark night.[9] In a criminal trial even if the investigation is illegal or even suspicious, the rest of the evidence must be serutinised independently of the impact of it. Otherwise, the criminal trial will plummet to the level of the Investigating Officers ruling the roost. Criminal justice should not be made the casualty for the wrongs committed by the Investigating Officers.[10] With respect to an offence under Section 498-A, I.P.C., the evidence of wife has to be considered with reference to the surrounding circumstances. In the instant case the wife alleged harassment, demand of dowry and cruelty after four years from marriage and husbanded wanted to remarry suspecting his wife to suffer from cancer which he considered to be a virulent disease which might have led to the said allegation. It was held that offence of cruelty was not made out.[11]

A party who produces witnesses in court produces them as witnesses of truth; and simply because portions of their statements are not favourable to the party producing them, they cannot be condemned as biased witnesses.[12]

A witness who is brought to the court under arrest is an unwilling witness and his evidence can have little value.[13] When a witness voluntarily appears before the court to give evidence, his evidence cannot be rejected on the ground that he was not summoned by the Court. In fact, it is the duty of every citizen, who is in the know of things concerning a crime to appear before the Court and give evidence.[14] Damaging statements cannot be got rid of merely by stating that they were slips of tongue.[15] Testimony of a particular witness cannot be thrown overboard merely because of the said witness being a person of easy virtue.[16]

A mere suggestion made in cross-examination which was denied is not at all evidence.[17]

When the offence is established by unimpeachable corroborative evidence, namely, the report lodged with the police and the medical evidence, there is no need to go in search of elusive independent witness.[18]

When light was enough to enable the assailants to identify their victims and kill them, it could hardly be contended, much less accepted, that the light was not enough to identify the assailants.[19] Where the identification of the acused assailants was doubtful and four out of the five accused were acquitted, it was held that the general grounds on which the evidence of the eye-witnesses has been rejected would equally apply to the case of the convicted accused also.[20]

Where the High Court, acquitted three out of the six accused by giving benefit of doubt to them, the Supreme Court, while dismissing the appeals preferred by the convicted accused, held that the evidence of the eye-witnesses was not found to be absolutely false; that the number of injuries and the number of victims clearly indicated that more than three accused persons participated in the attack, that the evidence of the eye-witnesses which was not false on material facts did not entitle the other accused to be acquitted.[21] Where the accused was absconding after being named in the F.I.R. and proceedings under Sections 82 and 83, Cr.P.C. were started against him, it was held to be a circumstance against him.[22]

Where the prosecution clearly stated that the blunt side of the weapon was used, there is no scope for believing that the sharp side was in fact used. The prosecution must elicit the opinions of the doctor, whether a particular injury alleged to have been caused by a blunt side was possible by showing the weapon to him.[23] Where the prosecution rested its case on the evidence of the eye-witnesses and not on circumstantial evidence, failure on its part to prove to whom the pair of shoes found near the dead body belonged did not impair the prosecution story.[24] Where the chemical analyser gave acknowledgement receipt of the sample packets and recorded that seals thereon were found intact, it was held that the question of not examining the police constable who took the sample to the chemical analyser was not relevant as in transit tampering with the sample was altogether excluded.[25]

Where the witnesses, though strangers to the accused did not disclose the incident of brutal assault on the deceased to anybody for two days, their testimony was held to be not reliable.[26] Where in a patricide case, the evidence of the witnesses was inconsistent and uncorroborated by medical evidence, the credibility of the F.I.R. was doubtful and the case of the accused was not distinguished from that of other co-accused who were acquitted by accepting evidence in part, the remaining one accused could not be convicted on the same set of evidence by making out a new case.[27] Where it was alleged that accused, aged 50 years, came on foot from his village situated at the distance of 40 kms from the place of occurrence and killed the deceased in the day light in the presence of three eye-witnesses, who were younger in age, and ran away to his village, uncaught by them, the testimony of the witnesses to this effect was held to be unbelievable.[28] Where the doctor who examined the head injury of the victim had considerable experience, his opinion that it was an incised wound, could not be rejected merely on the ground that he had not examined it with a lens and had given a general opinion.[29] Where the post-mortem was conducted by two doctors but the major work was done by one of them who was examined, non-examination of the other doctor would be of no relevance.[30] Where a victim who stated that he was travelling the bus whose conductor was killed, after purchasing a certain particular type of fertilizer whereas he produced the bill for some other type, it was held that such a discrepancy was not sufficient to prove that he was not travelling by that bus.[31] Where murder was committed by pouring petrol in the room of the victims and the rickshaw-puller who, after reading the news item, deposed about hiring his rickshaw by the accused on the day of the incident to the petrol pump and then to the place of incident, there being no enmity between him and the accused, his evidence could not be discarded merely because he deposed seven days after the incident.[32] In a case of dacoity, the eye-witnesses identified the accused in the electric light of the bulbs on two poles but the High Court discarded their evidence on the ground that the accused were wearing 'khaki' uniform and hats and hats must have cast shadows on their faces. It was held to be not proper as when they could recognise the colour of the dress, they could recognise their faces also as there was possibility light from bulb on one of the poles falling on their faces in the context of the direction they proceeded more so when the accused were known to them so their evidence deserved to be believed.[33] In State of U.P. v. Bhoora[34], the conduct of the person at whose house dacoity was committed, first going to the tubewell of a certain person who had a licensed gun and then to the police was held to be not unnatural. Where the opinion of the doctor that the multiple injuries and fractures caused to the ribs of the deceased could be due to scooter accident was belied by the absence of the corresponding external injuries and only minor damage to the vehicle, the accident theory was rejected.[35] The plea that the witness, the wife of the younger brother of the accused, gave her statement to the police under threat, hence her statement in the Court should not be believed, cannot be the ground for discarding her statement in the Court as she would have preferred to depose only about the facts which she could not have denied.[36]

In the absence of any convincing evidence, possibility of exchange of words between the husband and wife and also beating by him, is not a sufficient basis to presume that the accused committed murder of his wife.[37] Where death was caused by administering potassium cynide, rejection of the evidence of the prosecution witness, a goldsmith, from whom the poison of obtained on the ground that he had no licence to possess the said poison and that he had not disclosed the fact of giving the poison to the accused to any other person, was held to be not proper.[38] The history of assault contained in the medical papers is not substantive evidence and can only be used to contradict the person who has given it.[39] Where in a case under Section 307, I.P.C., relationship between the victim and the accused was hostile, the crime was registered promptly, the victim's evidence was unimpeached in the cross-examination and was corroborated by medical evidence, the evidence of the victim was held to be reliable to prove occurrence of the incident.[40] The evidence of the eye-witness could not be rejected on the ground that the brother-in-law of the complainant, an advocate, who had accompanied him to the police station had not signed the complaint as there was no reason for him to sign that complaint. Further, non-examining of the said advocate by the prosecution was not fatal as he could not be regarded a material witness.[41] Where in a murder trial neither the prosecution was coming with true facts nor the defence, the gainer would be the defence and not the prosecution.[42] Where the wife, who committed suicide, wrote letters disclosing cruelty to her at the hands of the husband, the handwriting of the letters was not disputed by him and the contents of the letters were corroborated by oral evidence, it was held to be sufficient to prove the charge under Section 498-A, I.P.C.[43] Where the Food Inspector purchased the samples of milk from the accused for analysis under the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act and the Public Analyst detected formaline in the milk samples but his report was not challenged, besides the general evidence also corroborated the prosecution case, the plea that formaline was added by the Food Inspector himself in the milk sample as a preservative, was not sustained.[44] The data given in the authorities on Medical Jurisprudence which relate to standard factory made guns and cartridges cannot be applied in respect of country made firearms.[45] Where there was overwhelming evidence that the occurrence took place inside the bus, the fact that the investigating officer did not remember to take the sample of blood-stains from inside the bus was not sufficient to throw doubt on the said evidence.[46] Mere recovery of guns from the possession of the accused in the absence of the ballistic report that it was in working order does not connect him with the crime.[47]

Where the witness, the daughter of deceased father, dared not to make any statement to the police during investigation as she suffered in the custody of and lived with her licentious mother and one of the accused, her corroborated deposition is the Court after 2½ years after the incident could not be discarded on that ground.[48] Where the discrepancy regarding the age of the deceased between the post-mortem report and that that of the witnesses was not brought to the notice of either the doctor or the witnesses, the discrepancy was held to be not pertinent to throw away the prosecution case.[49] Where the injuries caused to the deceased were sufficient to cause his death in the ordinary course of nature, subsequent development of septicaemia could not be taken into account.[50] Where neither the inquest report nor the memos vide which the police lifted blood-stained earth from the spot was attested by the eye-witnesses, it could not be a ground to hold that they had not actually witnessed the incident because the said documents were attested by the other witnesses who were also close relatives of the deceased.[51]

In a case, a tenant went abroad and stayed there for six years. In his tenanted shop, the tenant's nephew, paying rent on the tenant's behalf, conducted the business which the tenant did. The nephew gave returns of the shop to the tenant's wife and children for their subsistence and the tenant had every intention to return back. It was held that the nephew's possession, being on behalf of the tenant, the tenant could not be evicted for sub-letting.[52]

Evidence of the claimants claiming compensation under the Land Acquisition Act is not to be accepted without any corroboration. Intrinsic worth of their evidence should be tested by the principles governing appreciation of evidence.[53] In the construction of a will, the Court should ascertain the real intention of the testator appearing from the plain language of the entire instrument. In the instant case, the testator had bequeathed his properties to his daughter and her husband with no right of alienation to her husband without her consent and with a specified condition that the both shall live with cordial terms. However, both were not at cordial terms and were living separately. It was held that the husband would not be entitled to decree for partition and half share in properties covered under the will.[54]

(a) Presence at the scene of occurrence.—Presence of fingerprints at the scene and time of occurrence is a positive evidence of the presence of the person concerned (here accused) there but absence of his fingerprints there at the relevant time is not enough to exclude his presence there.[55]

Where the brother of the deceased, following him, found him dead when he reached near him, his not taking him (deceased) to the hospital could not give rise to inference of his not being present at the spot.[56]

Presence or absence of bloodstains on the relatives or eye-witnesses is not the sole criterion for ruling out or dis-believing their presence.[57]

(b) Source of light.—Where the evidence established that the deceased and his father were having meals and his mother and sister were serving the meals when the deceased was assaulted, it should be inferred that they had put source of light at that place. Non-seizure of lanterns from the place of occurrence is not material.[58]

(c) Dacoity and murder.—No water-tight compartment or computerised formula can be made for making a distinction between a case of dacoity and murder. No hard and fast rule can be laid down for appreciation of evidence demarcating a line between the cases of dacoity and murder.[59]

27. RE-APPRECIATION OF EVIDENCE

Where there was concurrent finding regarding reliability of the evidence of the eye-witnesses, their evidence could not be re-appreciated merely on the ground of some discrepancies in their testimony which did not appear to be material or serious.[60] The Supreme Court will not embark upon re-appreciation of evidence except in peculiar facts and circumstances of the case.[61] Such as a case where there was no direct evidence available on record connecting any of the accused persons with the commission of the crimes alleged against them and the entire case hinged on circumstantial evidence and neither the trial Court nor the High Court had catalogued the circumstances relied upon by the prosecution against the accused persons except for broad generalisation on the basis of the charges framed against them, the Supreme Court examined some of the evidence principally influencing both the Courts.[62]

28. MISAPPRECIATION OF EVIDENCE

Mere misappreciation of evidence alone would not be a ground to set aside the judgment of acquittal in revision, that too by a private party, in the absence of any appeal against it.[63]

29. PROBATIVE VALUE OF EVIDENCE

The probative value of evidence is the weight to be given to it which has to be judged having regard to the facts and circumstances of each case.[64] The totality of the evidence of a witness has to be taken into consideration for fixing its probative value.[65]

30. APPRECIATION OF THE TESTIMONY OF VICTIM OF SEXUAL ASSAULT

Where in a rape case, the evidence of the prosecutrix was reliable, precious little would turn on innocuous circumstances like non-examination of the doctor and her father[66] and mere absence of injury on her private parts and the breast, cannot lead to a conclusion that it was a consented affair.[67]

Conviction can be based on the sole testimony of the prosecutrix, if the same is found to reliable and corroboration of her evidence is not required as a rule of law.[68] Where the prosecutrix, the victim of rape, did not disclose the incident to her husband and the medical evidence showed abrasions about 2-7 days old whereas the incident had taken place about 15 days back, conviction could not be based solely on her evidence.[69] Where the testimony of the prosecutrix bristles with infirmities and improbabilities, it cannot be relied upon so as to sustain conviction.[70] Where the testimony of the victim of kidnapping and rape was inconsistent with medical evidence and chemical examiner report and the witnesses had made a false statement in the Court regarding her literacy, it was held to be not trustworthy.[71] Where the minor prosecutrix recognised the accused rapist in dark night from his voice, stature and features and immediately after the occurrence saw him running away in the moonlight but the distance was not mentioned, it was held that recognition from voice and stature was a feeble type of evidence and the accused was given benefit of doubt.[72]

Discrepancy of shifting of place of occurrence by the prosecutrix/the victim of rape from main road to 20 feet away from it, is minor and does not amount to contradiction.[73]

31. IMPROPER PROCEDURE

Where certain letters were not adduced as evidence in the case through any procedure known to law nor any affidavit was filed by anyone at least formally proving them in evidence, using part of the said letters by the Court against the accused was illegal.[74]

32. DETERMINATION OF AGGRESSOR

For judging the question of being aggressor in cases of bi-lateral clash, the number of injuries found on the side of the complainant or the accused cannot be the basis.[75]

33. DELAY OR DISCREPANCY IN F.I.R.

Where there was a delay of three days in lodging the F.I.R., and the gun shot injury was found on the back of the victim whose statement was recorded 17 days after the occurrence, it was held that the identity of the assailant is suspicious and the conviction cannot be sustained.[76] Where the testimony of the witnesses and materials indicated that the earlier version of the incident was suppressed by the prosecution and there was probability of the F.I.R. coming into existence only after deliberation with the Police Inspector besides there being an inordinate delay of 10 hours in lodging the same, these things were held to be fatal to the prosecution case.[77]

Where there is no explanation for the delay of 2 days in sending the F.I.R., to the Magistrate's Court, the circumstance gives rise to suspicion about the offence.[78]

The fact that there was delay in recording or preparing the F.I.R. and that the earliest version was not before the Court, was not sufficient to reject the prosecution evidence.[79]

Where the witness stated that he identified the accused in the light of a torch, it was held that the evidence of eye-witnesses cannot be discarded on the ground that there was no mention of the torch in the F.I.R. or in the statements given before the police.[80] Suppression of the fact by the complainant in the F.I.R. that there was also an unknown person among the assailants, might lead to presumption that he could not identify anybody and had incorrectly named the assailants in the F.I.R.[81]

Where there was omission of minute details in the F.I.R., it was held that giving minute details in the F.I.R. cannot be expected nor is it possible and that, when there were consistent statements of the informant and other witnesses during the trial, mere omission of minute details in the F.I.R., does not discredit their evidence.[82]

34. F.I.R. AT UNCONCERNED POLICE STATION

Where the victim with gunshot injuries died on the way to a place where better medical facilities were available and F.I.R. was lodged at that place, no adverse inference could be drawn against the prosecution for not lodging the F.I.R. at the concerned police station.[83]

35. INTERPOLATED F.I.R.

Where the names of two accused persons and the used of swords and soda water bottles in assaults, not mentioned in the Emergency Police Report lodged earlier, were interpolated in the F.I.R. as a result of afterthought, it was most fatal to the prosecution and it was likely that the informant had not seen the incident.[84]

36. DISCREPANCIES—CONTRADICTIONS, OMISSIONS AND IMPROVEMENTS IN ORAL EVIDENCE

Where all the witnesses gave a consistent account of the happening which was sufficient in itself to convict, it was immaterial that there were slight discrepancies in examination-in-chief and cross-examination, or that there was one more witness who was not produced.[85] Witness showed slight discrepancies as to the number of blows and whether the victim was at the time in a standing or lying posture. The Supreme Court observed that such discrepancies in matters of detail may occur even in the evidence of truthful witnesses.[86] Such variations creep in because there are always natural differences in the faculties of different individuals in the matter of observation, perception and memorisation of details. That is hardly a ground for rejecting their evidence when there is consensus as to the substratum of the case.[87] Minor contradictions in the testimony of illiterate and ignorant women who were eye-witnesses were held to be not material.[88] Accuracy could not be expected from witnesses as to the number of injuries, shots, etc. But unexplained discrepancies in the statement of witnesses would give benefit of doubt.[89] A person who witnessed a murder was so upset and shocked that he could not speak anything on reaching home until he recovered his breath. This did not destroy the value of his testimony.[90] Where a witness contradicted himself, his first statement should be preferred.[91] An Adivasi woman showed some discrepancies in her evidence, her evidence was even so accepted.[1] Minor discrepancies,[2] improvements made by a witness in his testimony and variations in earlier and later statements do not by therefore make his testimony infirm.[3] The fact that a witness improves his testimony at the trial or that he was not reliable at one point does not ruin the value of his testimony in its entirety.[4]

Much importance should not be given to minor discrepancies and technical errors or details. Minor discrepancies which do not go to the root of the matter and shake the basic version on the witness cannot be given undue importance. Minor discrepancies in respect of minor details of the incident, including the sequence of events and overt acts, are possible even in the version of a truthful witness. No criminal case can be free of such minor discrepancies and inconsistencies.[5] Minor contradictions in the statement of witnesses under S. 161, Cr.P.C. and the depositions made by him during investigation and the statement made before the trial Court, are not fatal for the prosecution.[6] Discrepancies in matters of details regarding the blows given by the assailant, occur even in the evidence of truthful witnesses, and they are hardly a ground for rejecting their evidence when there is consensus as to the substratum of the case.[7]

Where the injuries were caused by a lethal weapon and the evidence was inconsistent with the medical evidence and of the ballistic expert, the accused is entitled to acquittal.[8] Where a complainant gave the assailants' names in the F.I.R. but in the evidence he deposed at one place that he did not know the assailants and at another place he said that he knew them for the last two or three years, it was held that such evidence is not worthy of credence.[9] Where the prosecution gave two sets of evidence, one set condemning the other, such evidence is unreliable.[10] Where the evidence led before the trial court was at variance with the pleadings, and conflicting versions were given by interested witnesses, it was held that the witnesses were unreliable.[11] Where there are two irreconcilable versions of a case or an event, neither of the versions could be accepted, and the Court should not be called upon to choose between the two irreconcilable versions.[12] When the witness has spoken to that which is inherently improbable and contrary to what he stated on oath on a previous occasion, his evidence has to be rejected.[13] If contradictory statements are made at various stages of the case, it would affect the reliability of the witness.[14] Where there are conflicting theories even as to the time and place of the occurrence, the conviction cannot stand.[15] Where the allegation was that the accused used a penknife and even the inquest report shows recovery of penknife steeped in blood but the chemical examinors certificate shows absence of blood on it, it was held that the discrepancy throws suspicion on the entire evidence connecting the acused with the crime.[16] Where in the seizure list there was mention of four receptacles and three accused concerned with them, but the prosecution witnesses stated that one particular accused alone produced all the four receptacles from inside the hay stack, it was held that their evidence was contradicted by the earlier documentary record to which both the witnesses are parties; and so should not be relied upon.[17]

Minor variance in evidence cannot dislodge the prosecution version which is proved beyond reasonable doubt.[18] Variance about the time of occurrence given in the F.I.R. and in the dying declaration, or disparity in the statements about the exact nature of the weapons used are not matters sufficient to discard the main version of the injured person with regard to the commission of the crime by the accused.[19]

The mere fact that the evidence of eye-witnesses is inconsistent with the medical evidence will not by itself render the former unreliable.[20] Where the evidence of eye-witnesses was beyond doubt as to the fact that the accused committed the murder by firing the gun shots, the inconsistency between the opinion of the expert and the prosecution evidence relating to the distance from which gun shots were fired carries no weight.[21]

Where there are contradictions or inconsistent statements of the witnesses, the court is not justified in discarding all the evidence without any attempt at evaluation of the inherent quality of the evidence.[22] The fact that there is a great discrepancy between the evidence of witnesses A and B as to the distance between A's house and the house of the accused, is no ground for holding, that A is not a truthful witness, especially when the distance has no relevance in the case.[23] It is not possible for every witness to remember all the details; some differences in the details are generally found even in the case of honest witnesses and unless the contradictions are material, the evidence need not necessarily be disbelieved.[24]

In a criminal trial, discrepancies do not necessarily demolish the testimony; delay does not necessarily spell unreliability and tortured technalities do not necessarily upset conviction when the Court has had a perspicacious, sensitive and correctly oriented view of the evidence and probabilities to reach the conclusion, proof of guilt can be sustained despite little infirmities, tossing peccadilloes and peripheral probative shortfalls.[25] Eye-witness deposing before police about presence of a certain person at the deceased's house but denying his presence before trial court; the testimony cannot be rejected merely on the ground of that discrepancy.[26] In a case of dacoity, contradictions among the prosecution witnesses as to the weapons possessed by the accused do not discredit the testimony of such witnesses.[27] In all rioting cases where people observe under stress and emotion, an occurrence for a short space from different angles and they have different temperaments, capacity to observe, intelligence, and memory powers, discrepancies are bound to occur. In such cases broad probabilities have got to be considered.[28]

The slight discrepancy as to the time when a will was executed is not so serious as to destroy the evidence when it is given eight or nine years after the execution of the will.[29] Mere discrepancy about the date on which her (eye-witness) evidence was actually recorded would not be sufficient to hold that she was a planted witness as the testimony of the eye-witnesses corroborated each other's on material aspects.[30] In a case of awarding compensation, when the presence of witnesses at the scene of accident, is not doubted, minor contradictions would not make their evidence unreliable.[31]

Where there was variance in the evidence of witnesses in regard to the particulars of distribution of a pamphlet, it was held that the evidence need not be disbelieved.[32]

Where there was heavy traffic on the road according to one witness and there was no heavy traffic according to another, it was held that, as one spoke about the time of accident while the other spoke of the time immediately after the accident, when naturally a crowd had gathered, the evidence could not be ignored as contradictory.[33] Where a large number of accused persons are involved in the occurrence of a crime, the witness who is also injured in the incident, can naturally get confused and his testimony cannot be rejected on the ground of contradiction.[34]

Unless the discrepancies and contradictions are so material and substantial and that too in respect of vitally relevant aspects of the facts deposed, the witnesses cannot be straightaway condemned and their evidence discarded in its entirety.[35]

Where the contradictions and omissions in the statement of each witness are verbatim the same as that of the others, even narrations and the sequence of events are the same, it is not safe to rely on the evidence of such witnesses.[36] Where the eye-witness made contradictory statements, his testimony was not reliable.[37] Where the eye-witnesses gave contradictory statements, it created doubt about their presence at the scene of occurrence. Conviction was set aside.[38] In a case of brutal assault the victim failed to disclose the names of certain accused as he had not completely recovered when his statement was recorded. He was under apprehension of those accused as he stated in his examination and cross-examination. In the circumstances his substantive version of testimony implicating those accused as assailant could be accepted.[39]

Where the injured witness, giving consistent version of the occurrence, tried to implicate more persons as assailants in his later version, it was held that unless identity of other implicated persons as participants in crime is conclusively established, they would be entitled to benefit of doubt.[40] Where 10 to 12 armed persons assaulted the victim party and the witnesses gave a graphic account of who injured whom and on what part of body the weapons struck, the embellishments were to be ignored when they do not affect the substratum of the prosecution case.[41] Where the witness changed her statement easily at her convenience, her evidence inspired no confidence and no implicit reliance could be placed on such witness.[42] Where the statements of the witness were motivatedly improved and deviated from his earlier statements, his evidence could not be relied upon.[43] Where the eye-witnesses did not give the names of two of the accused in their initial version to the police and the doctor though all the accused were known to them and subsequently they improved their version and gave no explanation of the injuries on the body of the deceased, conviction could not be based on their evidence.[44] Where an approver was deposing with respect to events which took place over a period of three years, it was natural to occur some inconsistencies of minor nature in her evidence. Giving more details while deposing before the Sessions Court' are not improvements of such a nature as would create any doubt regarding her trustworthiness.[45]

37. FALSUS IN UNO, FALSUS IN OMNIBUS

Witnesses cannot be branded liars in toto and their testimony rejected outright even if parts of their statements are demonstrably incorrect or doubtful. It is sound common sense to refuse to apply mechanically the maxim "falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus". The Court has to assess the worth of necessarily imperfect human testimony.[46]

This maxim means "false in one thing, false in everything". It is now well accepted that this maxim is not acceptable as a sound principle in our country.[47] It was observed: "The maxim 'falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus' is neither a sound rule of law nor a rule of practice. Hardly one comes across a witness whose evidence does not contain a grain of untruth or at any rate exaggerations, embroideries or embellishments. It is, therefore the duty of the Court to scrutinise the evidence carefully and, in term of the felicitous metaphor, separate the grain from the chaff." But, it cannot obviously disbelieve the substratum of the prosecution case or the material parts of the evidence and reconstruct a story of its own out of the rest.

The maxim 'falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus' has not received general acceptance in different jurisdictions in India; nor has this maxim come to occupy the status of a rule of law. It is merely a rule of caution. All that it amounts to is that in such cases the testimony may be disregarded and not that it must be disregarded. The doctrine merely involves the questions of weight of evidence which a court may apply in a given set of circumstances. But it is not what may be called 'a mandatory rule of evidence'.[48]

The principle of 'falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus' does not apply to criminal trials and it is the duty of the court to separate the grain from the chaff instead of rejecting the prosecution case on general grounds.[49] The Court can sift the deposition of any witness and accept a part thereof while rejecting the other part.[50] When the believable part of the testimony is not separable from the rest of unbelievable part, the entire testimony is liable to be rejected.[51] In the undermentioned cases, the maxim was held not applicable.[52]

The Supreme Court[53] held : "The mere fact that the evidence of the prosecution witnesses is not firm and safe enough to be relied upon with regard to the part assigned to the acquitted accused in the occurrence, is no ground to reject it mechanically against the other accused also. The maxim 'falsus in uno falsus in omnibus' is not to be blindly invoked in appraising evidence adduced in our courts, where witnesses seldom tell the whole truth but often resort to exaggerations, embellishments and 'padding up' to support a story however true in the main. It is the function of the court to disengage the truth from falsehood and to accept what it finds to be true, and reject the rest. It is only where truth and falsehood are inextricably mixed up, polluting beyond refinement, the entire fabric of the narration given by a witness that the Court might be justified in rejecting his evidence in toto."

An absurd embellishment in evidence does not call for discarding that part of it which may be true.[54] The mere omission of an eye-witness to mention all the details of the occurrence in his statement before the police cannot be a good ground for brushing aside his sworn testimony in Court. If the evidence of the witness is inconsistent with respect to the weapon in the hand of a particular accused person, then his evidence may be disregarded only with respect to the weapon with which that accused was armed with, but that cannot justify the rejection of his evidence even with regard to the identification of a particular accused person as a member of the mob.[55] Where some of the accused are acquitted on the evidence of the prosecution witnesses, it is no ground for rejecting the trustworthy part of the evidence of those witnesses in respect of the other accused.[56] Where some of the accused were falsely implicated in the crime, that itself cannot be a ground of applying this principle in respect of other accused.[57] Where a witness does not depose to some facts to be truthful, it is not a ground for rejecting his whole testimony.[58] Where a witness had falsely deposed about the assault launched by three accused who were acquitted, there can be no guarantee of truth in her claim that she saw the other accused assaulting the deceased.[59] Where the witness was trying to suppress the facts with a view to suggest falsehood, her evidence was rightly not accepted.[60]

This principle does not come to the rescue of a witness if the major part of his testimony is found to be false and only a small part may be true. It may come to his rescue in the converse situation.[61]

38. ENMITY OF THE WITNESSES WITH THE ACCUSED

Enmity of the eye-witnesses with the accused cannot be a ground to reject their testimony outright. Such testimony has to be scrutised with greater care and caution.[62] Enmity between the witness and the accused has to be so grave that false implication may be the result. But mere, hostility cannot be sufficient to show that a person would make a false allegation against his own brother. It is a double edged sword. In a given case, it may be the basis of false implication; whereas in another it may be foundation of crime.[63] The mere existence of enmity, particularly when it is alleged as a motive for the commission of the crime, cannot be made a basis to discard or reject the testimony of the eye-witnesses.

the deposition of whom is otherwise consistent and convincing.[64] Where one of the accused did not join the other accused in attacking the deceased, there was possibility of his being falsely implicated due to past enmity.[65] Where independent witnesses deposed the fact of enmity between the accused and the victims and there was no animosity between those witnesses and the accused persons, their evidence was held to be trustworthy.[66]

39. CORROBORATION

"The word 'corroboration' connotes support or confirmation, and indicates, in relation to the law of evidence, that certain evidence (the evidence to be corroborated) is confirmed in its tenor and effect by other admissible and independent evidence (the corroborating evidence)."[67]

Lord READING said that corroborative evidence is evidence ". . . . . which confirms in some material particulars not only the evidence that the crime has been committed but also that the prisoner committed it."[68]

Corroboration is a rule of prudence and evidentiary value of a deposition which is otherwise admissible is not just wiped out in the absence of corroboration.[69] The rule of corroboration is only a rule of prudence. Where the sole evidence of the complainant is found to be thoroughly reliable and acceptable, there is no rule of law precluding the Court from convicting the accused solely on the basis of such evidence.[70] It is highly unsafe to convict the accused solely on the basis of uncorroborated evidence as to the recovery of the stolen property at the instance of the accused.[71]

"Independent witness" is not a technical rule of evidence which compels the Court to accept any testimony, however false, improbable, or absurd. It is only a fact raising a presumption of truthfulness which is rebuttable. What is vital is not the witness himself but his testimony.[72] Where there was evidence about physical and mental torture of the deceased, newly wedded wife from her mother, elder brother and other close relations, such depositions need not be discarded simply on the score of absence of corroboration by independent witness.[73]

The corroboration must be by independent testimony confirming in some material particulars not only that the crime was committed but also that the accused committed it. It is not necessary to have corroboration of all the circumstances. It would be sufficient if there were corroborations as to the material circumstances of the crime.[74] Where the witness is neither wholly reliable nor wholly unreliable, the Court seeks corroboration from some independent evidence or from circumstances. There can be no corroboration of a false or doubtful witness by another witness of the same character.[75]

In regard to the evidence of accomplice and evidence of partisan witnesses the former needs corroboration for conviction while no corroboration is necessary in the latter case.[76]

The corroboration that is required in the case of the testimony of a witness who is the relation of the deceased in a murder case, is not what would be necessary to support the evidence of an approver, but what would be sufficient to lend assurance to the evidence before the Court and satisfy the Court that the particular persons were really concerned in the murder of the deceased.[77] There is no general rule of prudence requiring corroboration of the evidence of eye-witnesses. In a given case, a judge for reasons special to that case and to that witness, can of course say that he is not prepared to believe, unless he is corroborated.[78] Discrepancies in the evidence of eye-witnesses, unless they are very vital, cannot affect the credibility of their evidence and corroboration of evidence with mathematical niceties cannot be expected in criminal cases.[79]

The statement of an eye-witness can well be corroborated by the Medical evidence.[80]

In a case under the Arms Act, it was held that conviction even on uncorroborated police evidence is not per se illegal as no corroboration can reasonably be expected.[81] In a case of seizure under Excise Act independent corroboration of the deposition of the official witness is necessary when it suffers from infirmity.[82] Corroboration to the evidence regarding the demand and the acceptance of bribe (Anti-corruption Act) need not be direct. It can be by way of circumstantial evidence also.[83]

Under Section 288 of the (old) Cr.P.C. (now omitted in the 1973 Code) it is held that the corroboration of evidence admitted is not always necessary.[84]

The evidence of witnesses who came several hours after the occurrence of the crime has ordinarily got to be excluded being of no corroborative value.[85]

40. CORROBORATION IN CIVIL CASES

Mere publication of report of a meeting in local newspapers is not sufficient to corroborate testimony of witnesses who depose that the impugned statement was made by a particular speaker at the meeting.[86]

In a suit by a mother on behalf of a minor son claiming a share in property of a 'sudra' joint family, on the basis that the minor son was the illegitimate son of the deceased member, she deposed that she was a concubine of the deceased in his continuous and exclusive keeping at the time of the birth of the child. It was held that testimony of the woman alone without corroboration is not sufficient for holding that she was such a concubine.[87] The omission of corroborative evidence of the mother of the adopted son and of the priest who officiated at the ceremonies is not fatal to the plaintiff's case of adoption when the evidence of other witnesses is unchallenged.[88]

Evidence of conversion of a member of a scheduled caste to Budhism in a case may be corroborated by evidence of his conduct subsequent to conversion.[89]

A Kabuliat can be used as corroborative evidence of oral lease for less than a year.[90]

41. CREDIBILITY

The question of credibility of a witness has primarily to be decided by referring to his evidence and finding out as to how the witness has fared in cross-examination and what impression is created by his evidence taken in the context of the other facts of the case.[1] In considering the question as to whether evidence given by the witness should be accepted or not, the Court has to examine whether the witness is an interested witness and to enquire whether the story deposed to by him is probable and whether it has been shaken in cross-examination. It would be unsafe to discard the evidence of a witness which appears otherwise to be reasonable and probable, merely because some suggestions were made to him without those suggestions being proved to be true.[2] The respectability and veracity of any witness does not necessarily depend upon his status in life, e.g., the witness being a school teacher, it cannot be presumed that whatever he deposes is gospel truth.[3]

Cross-examination is not the only method of discrediting a witness. Courts are not bound to accept the testimony merely because there was no cross-examination. The Court has to see the intrinsic merits of the evidence in the chief examination, depending on the probabilities of the case.[4] Where the sole interested eye-witness of the incident, the wife of the deceased, gave a different statement in her cross-examination but afterwards she reconciled her evidence stating that her statement in the examination-in-chief was correct, the veracity of her version was not affected as the statement during cross-examination was made in an unguarded moment.[5] Minor discrepencies shown in the cross-examination are of no consequence and show that the witness was not tutored. The evidence of such a witness is reliable.[6] Committing mistakes on certian irrelevent points is no ground for complete rejection of the evidence of a witness.[7]

Although defence witnesses are often untrustworthy, it is wrong to assume that the prosecution witnesses are always right and trustworthy.[8] Credibility and trustworthiness ought also be attributed to the defence witnesses at par with that of the prosecution their lapses are also to be treated equally.[9] Even though the Court is unable to rely fully on the evidence of prosecution witnesses with regard to some of the accused, it can still accept the evidence of those witnesses with regard to other accused.[10] Where a person appeared as prosecution witness four or five times in police cases pertaining to a particular police station, it was held that evidence of such witness does not carry any value.[11]

The evidence of eye-witness, if accepted, is sufficient to warrant conviction though in appropriate cases the Court may, as a measure of caution, seek corroboration by some confirmed circumstances from other sources.[12] Where the sole eye-witness is a near relation of the deceased and there was delay in filing F.I.R. it was held that it required some corroboration.[13] Where the first informant lodged the F.I.R. after 24 hours and not only that she made material omissions in it but also in her statement to the Investigating Officer, the witness was not reliable.[14] It was held that the evidence of hostile witnesses is not sufficient to corroborate evidence of partisan witnesses.[15] The fact that the F.I.R. was lodged within 35 minutes of the occurrence at the police station at a distance of 2 miles from the place of occurrence, and the fact that in the F.I.R. the names of the accused and the names of the eye-witnesses were mentioned, lends considerable corroboration to the testimony of the witness regarding the participation of the accused in the occurrence.[16] Where the circumstances justify it, a court may refuse to act upon the uncorroborated testimony of a trap witness. On the other hand, a Court may well be justified in acting upon the uncorroborated testimony of a trap witness, if the Court is satisfied that the witness is a truthful witness.[17]

A witness who goes to the extent of making intentionally false statement cannot be relied upon for purpose of convicting the accused.[18] Dismissal of a previous complaint of a witness against some other persons or false statement of a witness in an earlier case cannot be grounds of disbelieving the witness in a subsequent case. If truth is separable from falsehood, Courts can act on that part of the evidence which is truthful.[19] The fact of failure of a witness' married life with her husband and her subsequent living with another man cannot be a ground to discard her evidence.[20]

The hostility between the parties as a motive to murder, or the fact that the accused had absconded, may be erroneous tests to weigh the credibility of witness. If the version of the witness is corroborated by a medical witness, it can be no ground to discard the sole evidence just because he happens to be a brother of the deceased.[21]

Very serious injuries on the person of the witness could not be taken as self-inflicted. They rather establish his presence at the occurrence.[22] The ocular version of a witness who is injured in the incident is of great value.[23] An injured witness, would not easily substitute a wrong person for his actual assailant and his credibility cannot be doubted.[24]

Where the son of the victim promptly reported to the police about the occurrence and gave names of 15 out of 19 accused, it was held that his evidence cannot be rejected merely on the ground that his evidence did not fully accord with the sequence of events given by other witnesses.[25] Where a chaukidar of the locality had lodged a report of the incident with details, in the police station, before the murder was discovered and before even any one had suspected that the accused had a hand in the crime, it was held that the credibility of the evidence of the chaukidar cannot be challenged.[26] The mere fact that some complaints were made against a senior officer, cannot lead to the inference that he is not a very truthful witness, especially when no substance was found in the complaint by the higher authorities[27]; but where the court made adverse observations against a witness in earlier cases, his evidence has to be viewed cautiously.[28]

Where a person was summoned by police for committing breach of peace, it cannot be said that such person is not a reliable witness in a criminal case, as breach of peace is not such a thing as to tarnish the image and veracity of a witness in any manner.[29] The mere fact that a witness was told to be in the police station does not suggest that he was an accused person. Similarly, the testimony of the prosecution witness stating that he, along with the driver was taken by the Investigating Officer to the police station along with the car, could not be disbelieved.[30]

Where the incident occurred in the moon-lit night, there was no material to support the impossibility or improbability of witnessing the incident and there was no animosity between the accused and the eye-witness, the version of the eye-witness could not be doubted.[31]

In a case of robbery, the witness identified the accused during T.I. Parade but failed to identify him at trial. He testified that the accused used torch but did not mention it in his statement to the police. Other evidences were not probable. The accused was entitled to benefit of doubt.[32]

"In considering the credit of a witness and the weight to be given to his evidence the Court may consider not only what is said, but the way in which it is said. This includes the attitude of the witness to the Court, his general demeanour, his apparent frankness, evasiveness or other reaction to questioning (particularly hostile, in cross-examination) and his apparent power or lack of power of recollection."[33]

"The Courts have always accepted that the demeanour of witnesses (their frankness, anxiety, evasiveness or attitude to the Court) is an element of information that can be used to give greater or lesser weight to the credibility of the testimony."[34]

"If a witness gives his evidence in a forthright way, unperturbed by cross-examination, the Court will no doubt be more disposed to believe him than would be the case with a halting and prevaricating witness."[35]

Order 18, Rule 12 C.P.C., and Section 280, Cr.P.C. provide authority for the trial court Judge to record, if he thinks it material for the purpose of the case, remarks as to the demeanour of the witness during the course of his examination. The object is that the trial judge would have an opportunity to observe the conduct and behaviour of the witness while under examination, and if he makes a record of it, it would be useful for the trial court as well as the appellate court to assess the veracity and credibility of the witness. Unless the witness is a skilled actor, very often his demeanour gives the judge a clue to assess the weight of his testimony. That is why the appellate courts would be reluctant to interfere with such remarks as to demeanour, as the trial judge would have all the advantage of closely observing the witness in the witness box, which facility is not available to the appellate court.

The demeanour may be recorded contemporaneously when the witness is in the witness box[36] or in the judgment if written immediately after the evidence was taken and before the recollection of the judge has become dim.[37] If the judge records the demeanour in the judgment, he has to give reasons for doing so. Otherwise, such remarks would not only lose their weight but would give rise to a comment of bias.[38] Where a tribunal did not make any note about the demeanour of the witness in his deposition but made a note that the witness sometimes smiled and sometimes laughed while giving evidence, the Mysore High Court held that as there was no material to show as to why the witness behaved in such a manner, the tribunal erred in disbelieving the witness on account of the deameanour of his witness, in the judgement given after a long delay.[39]

43. POSSIBILITY OF APPROACHING AND INTIMIDATING THE COMPLAINANT AND THE WITNESSES

There is always the possibility of approaching and intimidating the complainant and the witnesses by the relatives of the accused though the accused remains in custody. Therefore, the police and administration should provide some protection to them.[40]

44. MISLEADING BY ACCUSED

An offender who attempts to mislead others need not necessarily be armed with a ready foolproof explanation to any cross-question from his listeners. Quite often such offenders might try to advance explanations which strike them momentarily when they are compelled to explain incongruous aspects. If the explanation offered by the offender appeared incredible to the listeners that is hardly a ground to conclude that the offender would not have given such explanation.[41]

45. JUDICIAL SCRUTINY OF DEPOSITIONS OF WITNESSES

Depositions of witnesses, whether they are examined on the prosecution side or defence side or as Court witnesses, are oral evidence in the case and hence the scrutiny thereof shall be without any predilection or bias. No witness is entitled to get better treatment merely because he was examined as a prosecution witness or even as a Court witness. It is judicial scrutiny which is warranted in respect of the depositions of all witnesses for which different yardsticks cannot be prescribed as for those different categories of witnesses.[42]

It may not be proper for any judge either to accept or disbelieve the evidence of a witness from the manner alone in which the witness is giving evidence before him. The demeanour of the witness can only be an additional factor which can be taken note of by the judge apart from the evidence placed before him. The judge must give reasons for accepting the evidence of one party and rejecting that of the other.[43]

46. WITNESS NOT MENTIONED IN F.I.R., INQUEST OR REQUISITION MEMO ETC.

Where the name of a witness is not given in the F.I.R. but he is examined at the trial, though the non-mention of the name may have some relevance, it would not be sufficient for rejection of that evidence.[44] Merely because the informant did not men-tion in the F.I.R. the names of some of the witnesses not known to him, there is no justification for rejecting that evidence.[45] The Andhra Pradesh High Court, following the decision in AIR 1953 SC 364, held that the circumstance that a witness' name was not mentioned in the F.I.R. is not a ground for disregarding his evidence as he was examined on the next day after the occurrence.[46] In a case of murder the son-in-law though not an eye-witness lodged the complaint without mentioning the name of the daughter of the deceased who was an eye-witness. It was held that her evidence cannot be doubted as she was examined by the investigating officer immediately after the occurrence.[47] Where the F.I.R. disclosed the names of the eye-witnesses and the police examined them two days after the occurrence, it was held that the evidence of the witnesses could not be rejected merely because of the delay in recording their statements.[48] An F.I.R. is not an encyclopaedia of the entire case and is not even substantive evidence. Where a murder is committed at night the wife and nephew are natural witnesses and their omission in the F.I.R. is not fatal.[49] Where the first informant was not an eye-witness himself and there was no evi-dence to show who disclosed the names of the assailants to the first informant, still the evidence of those who disclosed the names cannot be disbelieved on the ground that their names were not mentioned in the F.I.R.[50]

It is not necessary to give the names of eye-witnesses in the F.I.R. According to old Section 154 Cr.P.C. under which F.I.R. is made, what is required, is that information relating to the commission of a cognisable offence should be given. The words 'relating to the commission of a cognisable offence' do not and cannot mean that the information must give details of all the elements of the offence or give the names of the witnesses. Therefore, the fact that the name of the witness is not mentioned in the F.I.R. does not affect the evidence.[51] The Allahabad High Court held, in a motor accident case, that the evidence of a witness whose name was not found in the F.I.R. cannot be rejected.[52] When the informant of the occurrence mentioned that there were other persons besides those mentioned by him at the scene of occurrence, the testimony of the witness is not unworthy of credit because his name is not mentioned in the F.I.R.[53]

When there is an omission of names in the F.I.R., whether the Court can take or reject the evidence of a witness not named in the F.I.R. must depend upon not only on all the circumstances of the case, but also on the probabilities of the matter.[54]

Where the name of the witness was not given in the F.I.R. or in the inquest report, and he is the only witness examined as to the occurrence, it was held that such evidence could not be considered trustworthy.[55] The Rajasthan High Court, following an observation of the Supreme Court in 1971 Cr.L.J. (Notes) 39, held that the omission of the name of the witnesses in the F.I.R. is of a very serious nature which cannot be ignored by the Court, while assessing the worth of the evidence produced at the trial. The Himachal Pradesh High Court held that the credibility of such a witness is doubtful.[56] Where no explanation was given of recording the statement of the eye-witness after a long delay, his name was not disclosed in the F.I.R. though he was known to the complainant and he had no opportunity to identify the accused, his evidence could not be relied upon.[57]

The testimony of eye-witnesses could not be discarded merely because their names were not mentioned in the inquest memo or the places where they were standing were not indicated in the site plan. Moreover, their names were mentioned in the promptly lodged F.I.R.[58] The accused cannot be convicted on the lone testimony of the eye-witness, particularly when his name was not mentioned in the F.I.R. or the inquest memo.[59]

47. APPLICABILITY—DISCIPLINARY PROCEEDINGS

Rules of evidence are not applicable to inquiries under Art. 311 of the Constitution.[60]

In a case of removal of a bus conductor for not collecting fare from certain passengers, the Supreme Court held that strict rules of the Evidence Act were not applicable to a domestic inquiry. Unrecorded statements of passengers reproduced by the Inspector of the flying squad were held to be sufficient.[61]

48. APPELLATE COURT—APPRECIATION OF EVIDENCE

The uniform practice in the matter of appreciation of evidence has been that if the trial court has given cogent and detailed reasons for not accepting the testimony of a witness, the appellate court, in all fairness to it, ought to deal with those reasons before proceeding to form a contrary opinion about accepting the testimony which has been rejected by the trial court.[62]

When the appellate court is appreciating the evidence, it has to reject the entire evidence if such evidence of the prosecution witnesses is not separable in truth and falsehood.[63]

Where, the sessions judge acquitted the appellant as some of the eye-witnesses had not stated in their statements to police that it was the appellant who exhorted the accused to assault the deceased, and the High Court reversed the acquittal, the Supreme Court observed that, even if the High Court did not agree with the view taken by the sessions judge, that was no ground to reverse the order of acquittal particularly in view of the improbabilities of the case against the appellant.[64]

Where the Sessions Court and the High Court accepted the dying declaration of the deceased that it was the accused who committed the offence; and spoke about his motive, the Supreme Court held that, as there was a concurrent finding of both the courts regarding the motive of the accused, it had no reason to take a different view.[65]

Dealing with the rules framed by the High Court of Allahabad laying down the rules to be followed by the subordinate courts, the Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court observed: "After a witness has been found to be competent to give evidence and has made a statement which is admissible in evidence, the question whether it should be believed or not is essentially a question of fact. Neither the Evidence Act nor any other Act lays down any law governing the question which statement of a witness should be believed or should not be believed. Whether a statement of a witness should be believed or not depends upon so many circumstances and it is impossible to lay down any hard and fast rules. When the legislature itself has left these matters at the discretion of the court without attempting to fetter it by laying down any hard and fast rules, it is not open even to the highest court to fetter the discretion of not only lower courts, but also of itself, by laying down hard and fast rules, because it would be tantamount to legislating. Such an attempt is to be deprecated."[66]

Appellate Court cannot ordinarily interfere with the finding of the lower court based on the testimony of a witness.[67]

49. PROVED

The word 'proof' seems properly to mean anything which serves, either immediately or mediately, to convince the mind of the truth or falsehood of a fact or proposition; and the proofs of matters of fact in general are our senses, the testimony of witnesses, documents, and the like. "Proof does not mean proof to rigid mathematical demonstration, because that is impossible; it must mean such evidence as would induce a reasonable man to come to the conclusion."[68] Proof beyond reasonable doubt does not mean perfect proof, as it may sound artificial[69]. The degree of certainty which must be arrived at before a fact is said to be proved is that is described in this section.[70] In human affairs every thing cannot be proved with mathematical certainty and the law does not require it[71]. The definition of "proof" centres round probability. Thus an accused in establishing his plea of private defence may discharge his burden by evidence satisfying the jury of the probability of his defence.[72] "It is necessary to occasionally remind ourselves of this interpretation clause in the Evidence Act lest we act on artificial standard of proof not warranted by the provisions of the Act."[73]

"To prove something is to demonstrate that a fact or a state of affair exists."[74]

"Proof" is an ambiguous word. We sometimes use it to mean evidence, such as testimony or documents. Sometimes, when we say a thing is "proved" we mean that we are convinced by the data submitted that the alleged fact is true. Thus, "proof" is the end result of conviction or persuasion produced by the evidence.[75]

"Evidence is not proof. The trier of fact, having heard the evidence, decided on relevant facts, must come to a conclusion as to whether the facts in issue exist or not."[76]

"The rules of procedure regulate the general conduct of litigation; the object of pleading is to ascertain for the guidance of the parties and the Court the material facts in issue in each particular case; proof is the establishment of such facts by proper legal means to the satisfaction of the Court, and in this sense includes disproof. The first-mentioned term is, however, often used to include the other two."[77]

Every fact including the orders and judgments/decrees of the Courts must be proved by producing the 'best evidence' which may be available. The 'best evidence rule' is one of the most important rules whenever the question of proving a fact arises.[78]

JUSTICE MUKHERJI in Shard Birdhi Chand v. State[79] pointed out reiterating the cardinal principle of law, that where the facts placed before the court point out two views, one to the guilt of the accused and another to his innocence, the court should give the benefit of the view which is favourable to the accused.

Where the handwriting of the deceased in her letter was proved by the testimony of her brother and the accused made no effort to get the same compared with the admitted one, the handwriting was held to be proved. The mere fact the prosecution did not produce other letters written by her would not amount to suppression of evidence and over-writing on the top of the said letter regarding its date was held to be of no use to the accused.[80] In a case under the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act it was held that mere production of the copy of the covering letter will not be sufficient to prove that the Public Analyst's report has been delivered to the accused.[81]

Proof by circumstantial evidence.—See Notes under circumstantial evidence under the head "Evidence" (Supra).

50. SUSPICION OR CONJECTURE CANNOT TAKE THE PLACE OF PROOF

It is a fundamental maxim of criminal jurisprudence administered in this country that suspicion and conjecture are no substitute for proof.[82] Suspicion by itself however strong it may be, is not sufficient to take the place of proof.[83] In the absence of reliable evidence it is unwise to act on mere suspicion.[84] Mere recovery of articles alleged to have been stolen by a person charged with murder after a long time does not establish the guilt of the accused when there is no other connecting evidence. On mere suspicion however strong a conviction cannot be based.[85] Where the prosecution of the accused was for smuggling some goods, but it was not proved that all the goods which were produced were smuggled, conviction of the accused was not justified because suspicion cannot take place of proof.[86]

Where the opinion of witness as to condition of goods was based on guess work and not on personal knowledge, it was held that such an evidence was not acceptable.[87]

The Court's decision must not rest upon suspicion but must rest upon legal grounds established by legal testimony. Between "May be true" and "Must be true" there is inevitably a long distance to travel and the whole of the distance is to be covered by legal, reliable and unimpeachable evidence by the prosecution.[88]

The primary duty of the prosecution is to prove its case beyond all reasonable doubt, and it cannot be relieved of its duty by creating suspicion in the mind of Court or by proving suspicious circumstances against the accused in the case, because suspicion, however grave, cannot be taken to be sufficient for convicting the accused.[89]

The rules of evidence cannot be departed from, because there may be a strong moral conviction of guilt; for a judge cannot set himself above the law which he has to administer or make it or mould it to suit the exigencies of a particular occasion.[90] Suspicion cannot give probative force to testimony which in itself is insufficient to establish or to justify an inference of a particular fact (Ibid). Suspicion, though a ground for scrutiny, cannot be made the foundation of a decision.[91] The gravest suspicion against an accused will not suffice to convict him of a crime unless evidence establishes it beyond doubt.[92] "The sea of suspicion has no shore and the Court that embarks upon it is without rudder and compass".

Where there was loss of many consignments on account of looting of wagons, but the complaining appellant's consignment was not proved to have been lost whereas other consignments were lost, it was held that even the appellant's consignment which was not delivered was also lost through the looting.[93] While dealing with a case relating to corrupt practices in elections,[94] it was held that mens rea or Criminal intention was not necessary to establish under the Indian law relating to corrupt practices, but it does not mean that the charges of corruption can be held established without their being proved beyond the possibility of a reasonable doubt. The test in weighing the evidence led in such cases is generally similar to the one applied in criminal trials.

51. 'MATTERS BEFORE IT'

The expression 'matters before it' includes matters which do not fall within the definition of 'evidence' in S. 3. Therefore, in determining what is evidence other than evidence within the phraseology of the Act, the definition of 'evidence' must be read with that of 'proved'. It would appear, therefore, that the Legislature intentionally refrained from using the word 'evidence' in this definition, but used instead the words, 'matters before it'. For instance, a fact may be orally admitted in Court. The admission would not come within the definition of the word 'evidence' as given in this Act, but still it is a matter which the Court before whom the admission was made would have to take into consideration in order to determine whether the particular fact was proved or not.[95] Similarly, the result of a local investigation under the Civil Procedure Code must be taken into consideration by the Court though not 'evidence' within the definition given by the Act.

The result of a local enquiry by a presiding judicial officer, although it does not come under cls. (1) and (2) of the definition of the word 'evidence', falls within the meaning of the word 'proved' which comes immediately after. (Ibid)

The use of the word "proved" does not enable the Court to take into consideration matters including statement whose use is absolutely barred.[96]

52. DIFFERENCE BETWEEN EVIDENCE IN CIVIL AND CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS

The rules of evidence are in general the same in civil and criminal proceedings, and bind alike the State and the citizen, the prosecutor and the accused, the plaintiff and the defendant, the counsel and the client. There are, however, some exceptions, e.g. the doctrine of estoppel applies to civil proceedings only (BEST, 12th Edn., S. 94, p. 81), the provisions relating to confessions (Ss. 24-30), character of persons appearing before Courts (Ss. 53, 54), and incompetence of parties as witnesses (S. 120), are peculiar to criminal proceedings.

In a civil case, a judge of fact must find for the party in whose favour there is a preponderance of proof, though the evidence is not entirely free from doubt. In a criminal case no weight of preponderant evidence is sufficient, short of that which excludes all reasonable doubt. Unbiased moral conviction is no sufficient foundation for a verdict of guilty unless it is based on substantial facts leading to no other reasonable conclusion than that of guilt. In cases dependent on circumstantial evidence, the incriminating facts must be incompatible with the innocence of the accused and incapable of explanation on any other reasonable hypothesis than that of his guilt. Circumstantial evidence not furnishing conclusive evidence against an accused, though forming a ground for grave suspicion against him, cannot sustain a conviction. To justify the inference of guilt from circumstances, the inculpating facts must be shown to be incompatible with the innocence of the accused and incapable of explanation on any other reasonable hypothesis than that of guilt.[97] Circumstances which throw suspicion about the genuineness of a will for civil purposes may not be enough to sustain a criminal charge.[98] No man can be convicted of an offence where the theory of his guilt is no more likely than the theory of his innocence.[99] In a criminal trial the degree of probability of guilt has got to be very much higher—almost amounting to a certainty—than in a civil proceeding, and, if there is the slightest reasonable or probable chance of innocence of an accused, the benefit of it must be given to him. But that is quite a different thing from contending that even where the burden of proof, say of proving an exception, is on the accused, the term "proved" should be differently and more liberally construed than when the burden of proof is on the prosecution. The Evidence Act does not contemplate and does not lay down that the satisfaction which is required to be caused in the mind of a prudent man before acting on or accepting the prosecution story is to be of a different kind or degree from the satisfaction which is required when the accused has to discharge the burden which is cast upon him by law.[1] In a criminal trial, the degree of proof is stricter that what is required in a civil proceeding.[2] The standard of proof required in election matters in proving corrupt practices is the same as that for a criminal offence.[3]

The onus of proof in criminal cases never shifts to the accused, and they are under no obligation to prove their innocence or adduce evidence in their defence or make any statement.[4]

In a civil case, it is the duty of the parties to place their case before the Court as they think best, whereas in a criminal case it is the duty of the Court to bring all relevant evidence on the record and to see that justice is done.[5] In a criminal trial, it is for the Court to determine the question of the guilt of the accused and it must do this upon the evidence before it, independently of decisions in a civil litigation between the same parties. A judgment or decree is not admissible in evidence in all cases as a matter of course, and, generally speaking, a judgment is only admissible to show its date and legal consequence.[6]

The rules regulating the admissibility of evidence are, in general, the same in civil as in criminal proceedings.

53. PROOF IN CRIMINAL CASES

There are two levels of proof in criminal cases : for the prosecution, that level of persuasion is that proof must be beyond reasonable doubt; for the defence, that standard is proof on the balance of probabilities.[7]

When dealing with the serious question of the guilt or innocence of persons charged with crime, the following general rules have been suggested for the guidance of Tribunals:—

1. The onus of proving everything essential to the establishment of the charge against the accused lies on the prosecutor.
2. The evidence must be such as to exclude, to a moral certainty, every reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused.
3. In matters of doubt it is safer to acquit than to condemn, since it is better that several guilty persons should escape than that one innocent person should suffer.
4. There must be clear and unequivocal proof of the corpus delicti (substance of the offence).
5. The hypothesis of delinquency should be consistent with all the facts proved.[8]

DENNING J. elaborated on the nature of proof beyond reasonable doubt in these terms :

> "It need not reach certainty, but it must carry a high degree of probability. Proof beyond reasonable doubt does not mean proof beyond the shadow of a doubt. The law would fail to protect the community if it admitted fanciful possibilities to deflect the course of justice. If the evidence is so strong against a man as to leave only a remote possibility in his favour which can be dismissed with the sentence 'of course it is possible, but not in the least probable,' the case is proved beyond reasonable doubt, but nothing short of that will suffice."[9]

The burden of proof is always on the prosecution to establish beyond reasonable doubt all ingredients of an offence with which the person accused is charged[10] and it cannot fall back solely upon the evidence adduced by the accused persons in their defence.[11] Falsity of defence cannot take the place of proof of facts which the prosecution has to establish in order to succeed. A false plea can at best be considered as an additional circumstance, if other circumstances point unfailingly to the guilt of the accused.[12] Where the accused was a previous convict, the prosecution is not relieved of its duty to prove its case beyond reasonable doubt.[13] Where the question in an offence was dishonesty of the accused, it was held that the burden to prove the fact of dishonesty lay heavily on the prosecution, because of the basic presumption of innocence of the accused.[14] To throw the burden on the accused to prove his innocence would go against the basic presumption of innocence of the accused. The oral evidence has to be considered, irrespective of the explanation by the accused, to arrive at a conclusion.[15]

The evidence of the prosecution must be such as to exclude to a moral certainty every reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused.[16] The requirement of proof beyond reasonable doubt does not stand altered even after the introduction of Section 498-A, I.P.C. and Section 113-A of Indian Evidence Act.[17]

An accused need not prove his case to the same extent as the prosecution in order to succeed in his defence.[18]

Proof beyond reasonable doubt is a guideline, not a fetish, and a guilty man cannot get away with it because truth suffers some infirmity when projected through human processes. Judicial quest for perfect proof often accounts for police presentation of fool-proof concoction.[19]

Normally, when a witness says that an axe or a spear is used, there is no warrant for supposing that what the witness means is that the blunt side of the weapon was used; if that be the implication it is the duty of the prosecution to obtain, a clarification from the witness as to whether the sharp-edged or a piercing instrument was used as a blunt weapon.[20]

It is the obligation of the prosecution to explain the injury on the accused.[21]

It is not obligatory on the prosecution counsel to produce all witnesses who speak to the facts which the prosecution desires to prove. But the Court can, however, take into consideration absence of witnesses, whose testimony would be expected in adjudging on evidence as a whole.[22] The court has to consider the weight of the evidence given by the prosecution witnesses and not the number of witnesses to be examined by the prosecution i.e., evidence has to be weighed and not counted. It is the quality that counts.[23]

Where a person gives evidence on oath, the presumption is that he has spoken the truth. The burden is on the opposite party who challenges the veracity of the statement made on oath.[24]

Plea of Alibi can be accepted only when it is shown that it was impossible for the accused to be present at a place where the offence was committed.[25]

The evidence of a complainant is admissible as evidence under S. 245(3), Cr.P.C. even if the complainant is not subjected to cross-examination.[26]

54. BENEFIT OF DOUBT

The Court considers the evidence and decides whether that evidence proves a particular fact or not. When it is held that a certain fact is proved, the question arises whether the fact leads to the inference of guilt of the accused person or not; and in dealing with this aspect of the problem, the doctrine of benefit of doubt would apply and an inference of guilt can be drawn only if the proved fact is wholly inconsistent with the innocence of the accused and is consistent with the guilt.[27] Where the evidence showed that the murder was not caused in the way suggested by the prosecution, the accused was entitled to benefit of doubt.[28]

In a case under Section 302/34 I.P.C. the material prosecution witness vividly described the assault on the deceased. The name of accused No. 3 was not mentioned in F.I.R. In the absence of corroboration of involvement of accused No. 3, it was held that accused No. 3 was entitled to benefit of doubt.[29] Where there was infirm testimony of witness as to identity and connection of accused with crime, and there was absence of independent evidence of confirming testimony, it was held that benefit of doubt should be given to the accused.[30] Where two views are deducible from the conflicting evidence on record, the accused is to be given benefit of doubt.[31] Where the evidence of the prosecution witness shows that they had not come out with the true story, it was held that the accused must be given the benefit of doubt and acquitted.[32]

The fact that some of the accused have been given benefit of doubt is not sufficient ground to discredit the complainant's testimony with regard to the other accused persons who were convicted.[33]

In cases of group rivalries and enmities, there is general tendency to rope in as many persons as possible as having participated in an assault. The Court should therefore, scrutinize the evidence carefully and if there arises any doubt, benefit should be given to the accused. Where, in a case, the eye-witnesses were not able to give correct version as to when the deceased was given lathi blows, and there was serious discrepancy in their evidence on important points held, there was good reason to doubt their evidence.[34] In case of doubt arising with regard to any material fact in a criminal case, the accused is always entitled to benefit of such doubt.[35] Where there was inconsistency between ocular and medical evidence, it was held that conviction cannot be based on the ocular evidence and the accused has to be given benefit of doubt.[36] In a case under N.D. & P.S. Act it was held that if the police seals were not decipherable when the case property, the recovered contraband, was produced in the Court, the possibility of tampering with the property could not be ruled out and benefit of doubt must go to the accused.[37] Where the corpus delicti was not traceable and the prosecution was solely dependent on the retracted confession of the accused and the improbable manner the offence was committed, it was held that the accused was entitled to benefit of doubt.[38] Where there was contradictory oral evidence as to who took the deceased to hospital and the prosecution failed to examine the alleged eye-witness and the inspector who filed the charge-sheet, the accused was given benefit of doubt.[39] Where in murder case out of six accused persons two were given benefit of doubt on a certain ground which was available to two more accused also and participation of those two accused in crime was not established beyond reasonable doubt, these two accused were also held entitled to benefit of doubt.[40] Non-mentioning of dimension of bloodstains on the clothes in the seizure memo of the recovery of the bloodstained clothes, was held to be not sufficient to claim any benefit by the accused.[41]

55. PROOF IN CIVIL CASES OF CRIMINAL CHARACTER

In civil cases which involve allegations of criminal and fraudulent character, insistence on those charges being proved clearly and beyond reasonable doubt was held to be wrong.

The fact that the party is alleged to have accepted bribe in a civil case does not convert it into a criminal case and the ordinary rules applicable to civil cases would only apply. The contention that when bribery is to be inferred from the circumstantial evidence, the circumstances must be such so as to exclude any other reasonable possibility, cannot be accepted.[42]

Under the Representation of People's Act, for proving the corrupt practices in the election, the standard of proof required, is the same as that for a criminal offence.[43]

So also in the case of penalty proceedings under the Income-tax Act as the proceedings are of a penal nature, the proof is to be as that of a criminal prosecution.[44]

An illicit article seized under the N.D. & P.S. Act from the person of an accused, during a search conducted in violation of the safeguards provided in Section 50 of the said Act, cannot by itself be used as admissible evidence of proof of unlawful possession of the contraband on the accused. Any other material article recovered during that search may, however, be relied upon by the prosecution in other/independent proceedings against an accused notwithstanding the recovery of that material during an illegal search and its admissibility would depend upon the relevancy of that material and the facts and circumstances of that case.[45] Proof of the fact depends upon the degree of probability of it having existed. The standard required for reaching the supposition is that of a prudent man acting in any important matter concerning him.[46]

56. PROOF IN CIVIL CASES

". . . . . The case must be decided according to the preponderance of probability. If at the end of the case the evidence turns the scale definitely one way or the other, the tribunal must decide accordingly, but if the evidence is so evenly balanced that the tribunal is unable to come to a determinate conclusion one way or the other, then the man must be given the benefit of doubt."[47]

Where both parties have let in evidence, the burden of proof assumes secondary importance.[48]

It is not open to a court or a Tribunal determining a matter judicially, to insist on a particular mode of proving that matter and to exclude all other modes of proof, unless there is a law requiring it to do so. This will be particularly so when it is not within the power of the person concerned to obtain the proof as directed.[49]

Allegation as to bad faith or indirect motive or purpose cannot be held established except on clear proof thereof.[50]

Suit cannot be decreed on the basis of presumption under the Negotiable Instruments Act, as the initial burden is on the plaintiff who comes to court to prove the execution of the pro-note on which the suit is filed.[51]

The day or date of adoption is a material fact for its proof by omission to state which adoption becomes doubtful. It also becomes doubtful in absence of evidence of consultation between the natural and the adoptive father, non-examination of material witnesses and inconsistency about the ceremonies performed.[52]

57. PROOF OF PATERNITY

Where an illegitimate child was claiming maintenance from an alleged father and the paternity of the child was disputed, it would not be safe to accept the evidence of the mother regarding the child's paternity without proper corroboration.[53]

58. DISPROVED

A fact is said to be disproved when, after considering the matters before it, the Court either believes that it does not exist, or considers its non-existence, so probable that a prudent man ought, under the circumstances of the particular case, to act upon the supposition that it does not exist. On the other hand a fact is said to be not proved when it is neither proved not disproved.[54] The word "disproved" is akin to word "false." What is 'disproved' is normally said to be false thing. A fact is disproved normally by the person, who claims that an alleged fact is not true.[55]

This is merely the converse of the definition of 'proved'.[56]

59. NOT PROVED

The definition of 'proved' is the embodiment of a sound rule of commonsense. It describes what degree of certainty must be arrived at before a fact can be said to be proved. Proof means anything which serves, either immediately or mediately, to convince the mind of the truth or falsehood of a fact or proposition. It is apparent from the definitions of the words "proved", "disproved" and "not proved" in this section that the Act applies the same standard of proof in all civil cases.[57] The term 'not proved' indicates a state of mind between two states of mind ("proved" and "disproved") when one is unable to say precisely how the matter stands.[58] A fact which is not proved does not necessarily mean that it is a false one. A fact not proved is not necessarily a fact disproved. A fact is said "not proved" when it is neither proved or disproved. A fact which is not proved may be true or may be false. A doubt lingers about its truth.[59] Failure to prove a plea cannot be a ground to award compensatory cost as there is a distinction between the facts not proved and the facts proved or disproved.[60]

Where there was no evidence to show that a message was sent by the person by whom it was purported to have been sent and on the other hand he specifically denied it, it was held that the message was not proved.[61] In a case of theft of a vehicle, the accused allegedly changed its engine, colour etc. and got it re-registered in the new owner's name. There was no evidence as to who or at whose instance the said acts were done. So the issue against the accused could not be said to be proved.[62]

Where the provisions of the Rajasthan Premises (Control of Rented Eviction) Act conferred discretion upon the Court to strike out defence, if in the facts and circumstances of the case, the Court feels it proper to do so which the Court did in this case of default in payment of rent when the petitioner failed to prove the payment of rent, it was held that the case of the petitioner about the payment of rent was of 'not proved' and of not 'disproved' and the defence could be struck off in case of 'disproved'.[63]

Mere fact that some male relation writes improper letters to a married woman, does not necessarily prove that there was illicit relationship between the writer of the letters and the married woman who received them.[64] In a trial of M and S for causing death of one P by a pistol, the prosecution relied on the evidence of two witnesses who stated that accused M and S were seen with P, for the last time in a room on the night of the occurrence, there was evidence relating to the recovery of cartridge from the scene of occurrence, the seizure of pistol from the person of M, and the deposition of a ballistic expert. But the expert gave contradictory evidence to his earlier opinion in the witness box. The Supreme Court held that it was not established to whom the seized pistol belonged and hence the case against them was not established.[65]

60. STANDARD OF PROOF

"The phrase "standard of proof" is used to describe the degree to which the proof must be established."[66]

"May presume". S. 4. Whenever it is provided by this Act that the Court may presume a fact, it may either regard such fact as proved, unless and until it is disproved, or may call for proof of it:

"Shall presume". Whenever it is directed by this Act that the Court shall presume a fact, it shall regard such fact as proved, unless and until it is disproved:

"Conclusive proof". When one fact is declared by this Act to be conclusive proof of another, the Court shall, on proof of the one fact, regard the other as proved, and shall not allow evidence to be given for the purpose of disproving it.

COMMENTS

1. MEANING OF PRESUMPTION

This section empowers the Court to presume certain facts. The term 'presumption', in its largest and most comprehensive sense, may be defined to be an inference, affirmative or disaffirmative, of the truth or falsehood of a doubtful fact or proposition, drawn by a process of probable reasoning from something proved or taken for granted. (BEST, 12th Edn. Section 299, p. 267).

"Presumptions operate where certain facts may be presumed to exist even in the absence of complete proof."[67]

"A presumption is a rule of law by virtue of which, where a party proves one fact (the primary fact) a second fact (the presumed fact) will also be taken to have been proved, in the absence of evidence to the contrary."[68]

"The structure of all true presumptions requires first the proof of a basic fact or facts. Once this has been done different consequences follow so far as the presumed fact is concerned. In the weakest form of presumption the only effect of proving the basic fact is that the presumed fact may be found by the trier of fact. In other words the logical inference of the presumed fact from proof of the basic fact attracts a measure of formal endorsement."[69]

". . . . ., where a party is seeking to establish a relevant fact, he or she may be unable to do so but will be permitted to prove another fact from which that relevant fact will be presumed. There is a basic fact (the seven year absence, the birth during wedlock) and a presumed fact (the person's death, the plaintiff's legitimacy). When we use the word "presumption" in an evidentiary sense, this is what it means."[70]

" . . . . . a presumption is a standardized practice, under which certain facts are held to call for uniform treatment with respect to their effect as proof of other facts."[71]

"Unfortunately, the term 'presumption' is also frequently applied to rules of law which are in reality quite distinct from presumptions, and for the purpose of distinguishing these false presumptions, true presumptions are then unnecessarily referred to as 'rebuttable presumptions of law'. Rules of law provide that some fact shall be taken in all cases to be true, without proof of any primary fact, until the contrary is proved e.g. 'presumptions' of innocence and sanity."[72]

A presumption means a rule of law that Courts and Judges shall draw a particular inference from a particular fact, or from a particular evidence, unless and until the truth of such inference is disproved.

2. CLASSIFICATION OF PRESUMPTIONS

Presumptions are of two kinds. (1) Presumptions of fact, (2) Presumptions of law. Presumptions of fact are those where the Court may presume a fact. These are also sometimes called material presumptions. Instances of such presumptions are found in sections 86 to 88, 90 and 114 of the Act. The second category relates to presumptions of law. This can again be divided into rebuttable presumptions of law and irrebuttable presumptions of law. In the first case, the court shall presume a fact. Instances of such presumptions are to be found in sections 75 to 85, 89 and 105 of the Act. In the case of irrebuttable presumptions of law, one fact is declared to be conclusive proof of another. Instances of irrebuttable presumptions of law are found in sections 41, 112 and 113 of the Act and Section 82 of I.P.C.

Presumptions of fact or natural presumptions are inferences which are naturally and logically drawn from experience and observation of the course of nature, the constitution of human mind, the springs of human action, the usages and habits of society. These presumptions are generally rebuttable. Clause (1) of the section appears to point at presumptions of facts.

Presumptions of law are based, like presumptions of fact, on the uniformity of deduction which experience proves to be justifiable; they differ in being vested by the law with the quality of a rule, which directs that they must be drawn, they are not permissive like natural presumptions, which may or may not be drawn, and presumptions of law again differ in their force, according as they are rebuttable or irrebuttable. As to the former, the presumption shall stand good only until it is disproved. The latter class, or irrebuttable presumptions, the law holds conclusive.[73]

See sections 79 to 90 and Section 105 as to presumptions of fact and rebuttable presumptions of law.

The Supreme Court has classified, the presumptions as (1) Permissive presumptions or presumptions of fact, (2) Compelling presumptions or presumptions of law (rebuttable presumption), (3) Irrebuttable presumptions of law or conclusive presumptions.[74]

Disputable Presumption.—The conclusive presumptions, normally may arise out of consent of the parties or sometimes expressed in statutes. (TAYLOR 8th Ed, 90). There is yet another category known as disputable presumption of law. For example, under criminal law every accused is presumed to be innocent. So evidence is to be received to repel this presumption.

Distinction between Presumption of Law and Fact.—According to WIGMORE (Section 2491) the distinction between presumptions 'Of Law' and presumptions 'Of Fact' is in truth the difference between things that are in reality presumptions, and things that are not presumptions at all. According to STEPHEN, Presumption of Law in reality are rules of law and part of the law itself and the court may draw the inference whenever the requisite facts are before it. (5th Ed., pp. 391, 392).

"Traditionally there was a distinction between presumptions of law and presumptions of fact. There is no difficulty with the first category. Presumptions of law are arbitrary consequences expressly annexed by law to particular facts; and may be either conclusive, as that a child under a certain age is incapable of committing any crime; or rebuttable, as that a person not heard of for seven years is dead, or that a bill of exchange has been given for value. The term "presumption of fact" however is misleading. Its only use is to describe inferences which the mind naturally and logically draws from given facts, irrespective of their legal effect. Not only are they always rebuttable, but the trier of fact may refuse to make the usual or natural inference notwithstanding that there is no rebutting evidence."[75]

"Presumptions of fact" are inferences of certain fact patterns drawn from the experience and observation of common course of nature, the constitution of mind, the springs of human act, the usages and habits of society and the ordinary course of human affairs. If is not obligatory for the Court to draw the presumption of facts and the Act allows the Judge discretion in each case but in case of "presumption of law" no discretion has been left to the Court and it is bound to presume the fact as proved until evidence is given by the party interested to rebut or disprove it.[76]

Presumption of Fact.—Presumptions of fact need not necessarily be taken at the beginning of the consideration of a case. It was held that presumptions are always assumptions or inferences of fact, based upon our ideas and experience of the course of nature, the course of human business and the course of human conduct, that they are the assumptions and conscious inferences of a reasonable man; that there is no special magic about such presumptions or assumptions of fact as used in Courts of Law that no Full Bench, however numerous and however distinguished, can lay down that the Court shall make certain inferences or assumptions of fact in future cases.[77]

A presumption of fact cannot be drawn on mere conjecture.[78]

It is not permissible to offer any evidence to overcome an irrebuttable presumption of fact or law because such a presumption is a rule of substantive law rather than a matter of proof.

for months and had privacy, the presumption was conclusive that consummation of marriage was an accomplished fact unless there is any material to dislodge it.[79]

3. PRESUMPTION NOT EVIDENCE

Presumption is not in itself evidence. It is a rule concerning evidence. The rules of presumption are deduced from enlightened human knowledge and experience and are drawn from the connection, relation and co-incidence of the fact and circumstances.[80]

While dealing with sections 70 to 90 and 114 of the Evidence Act, the Allahabad High Court, held that if a presumption is not available under one section of the Act, it can still be drawn under another section of the Act.[81]

Dealing with a case of maintenance of an unmarried daughter, it was held that no presumption from the age, or of health of a daughter about the capacity to earn and maintain herself, can be drawn.[82]

4. MAY PRESUME

A Court, where it 'may presume' a fact, has a discretion to presume it as proved, or to call for confirmatory evidence of it, as the circumstances require. In such a case, the presumption is not a hard and fast presumption, incapable of rebuttal, a presumption juris et de jure.[83]

Under this section, it is open to the Court, upon proof of the marriage of a person on a certain date, either to regard as proved the subsistence of the marriage on a subsequent date unless and until it is disproved, or to call for proof of it, using the discretion entrusted to the court by the first clause in a judicial manner according to the circumstances of the case.[84]

When a certified copy of Khatauni was produced and there was no compliance with the rules as to its issue, it was held that a presumption of genuineness cannot be raised.[85]

In regard to commercial documents, when the certified copies of railway records were tendered in evidence, it was held that they would be presumed by Court to be correct, unless there is evidence to the contrary.[86]

It is unsafe to convict based upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice alone, although it is not illegal to do so. The Court should, therefore, regard an accomplice as prima facie unworthy of credit. This is a presumption which it is open to the Court to draw. It is not a hard and fast presumption but one which may be displaced in the circumstances of a particular case.[87]

The Court has discretion to call for proof of a document even if the document satisfies the conditions of Section 90 of the Act.[88]

If a presumption in respect of a document is not available under Section 90 of the Act, it would be open to the Court to raise a presumption under sections 4 and 14 of the Act. The raising of the presumption in regard to the due execution and proof of a document under Section 90, is discretionary.[89] Presumption under Section 113-A of the Evidence Act is not mandatory.[90]

Regarding the presumption under Section 118 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, the words 'until the contrary is proved' do not mean that the suit has to be decreed on the basis of presumption under seciton 118. Where the plaintiff and the defendant were disbelieved, it is permissible to look into the preponderance of probabilities and the circumstances of a particular case. The Court, while dealing with the question as to whether the contrary, viz, the absence of consideration, has been proved by the defendant, shall have to consider not only whether it believes that consideration does not exist, but also whether it considers the non-existence of consideration so probable that a reasonable man ought under the circumstances of the case to act upon the supposition that the consideration does not exist.[91]

The report of a doctor without his being examined as a witness is not admissible as evidence, as no presumption can be drawn under Section 4.[92]

Mere entry in the revenue records classifying the land as agricultural land, without further evidence, is not by itself sufficient to decide that the land was being mainly used for agricultural purpose, as no presumption can be drawn in that regard.[93] Merely on the basis of the evidence of the shopkeeper whom the accused paid a fake hundred rupee currency note and was found to in possession of thirteen more such notes, and that of other witnesses, the requisite mens rea of knowingly possessing fake currency notes could not be presumed as no specific question regarding the same was put to the accused.[94]

5. SHALL PRESUME

The expression "shall presume" leaves no discretion with the Court and there is legislative command to it to raise a presumption and regard such fact as proved unless and until it is disproved. The question of calling upon the parties to formally prove a fact does not arise.[95]

With regard to this type of presumption no discretion or option is left to the court. In cases in which a court shall presume a fact the presumption is not conclusive but rebuttable. The Supreme Court, held that the presumption under sectionn 4 of the Prevention of Corruption Act is one of law, and has to be raised in every case brought under that section. Presumption of law is introduced as an exception to the general rule as to the burden of proof in criminal cases and shifts the onus on to the accused. The legislature has chosen to use the words 'shall presume' and not 'may presume'. The former is a presumption of law, and the latter of fact. These phrases are defined in the Evidence Act for purposes of the Evidence Act. Section 4 of the Prevention of Corruption Act is in pari materia with the Evidence Act because it deals with a branch of the law of Evidence viz., presumptions, and therefore, should have the same meaning.[96] The A.P. High Court has held that the presumption under Section 4(1) of the Prevention of Corruption Act cannot be used in regard to an offence under Section 5(2) of the Act. It was further held that the accused need not adduce evidence in rebuttal, and his explanation with other prosecution evidence can be considered.[97] Under the Prevention of Corruption Act, it shall be presumed that the accused who has received a sum of money, (unless the contrary is proved) has accepted it as motive or reward.

The Supreme Court held that in considering the plea of insanity of the accused in a case of homicide, the normal presumption of the innocence of the accused and the burden on the part of the prosecution to prove the guilt beyond reasonable doubt never shifts. But the burden to prove the existence of circumstances bringing the case within an exception is on the accused, because the Court will presume absence of such circumstances. Under Section 105 of this Act read with the definition of 'Shall Presume' in Section 4, the Court shall regard absence of such circumstances as proved unless, after considering the matter before it, it believes that the said circumstances existed or their existence was so probable that a prudent man ought, under the circumstances of the particular case, act upon the supposition that they did exist—in other words, the accused will have to rebut the presumption that such circumstances did not exist. The accused has to satisfy the standard of a prudent man. Evidence adduced may not be sufficient to discharge the burden under Section 105, but it may raise a reasonable doubt in the mind of the judge as regards one or other of the necessary ingredients of the offence.[98]

In a defamation case based on a defamatory matter published in a newspaper, the Calcutta High Court, held that a copy of the newspaper is admissible under Section 81 of this Act and the genuineness of the document has to be presumed, and the plea that proof of the contents as per Section 61 should be let in, cannot be sustained and that the burden of proof shifts to the accused to disprove it.[1]

In the case of restitution of conjugal rights, where the legality and the validity of the marriage has not been impugned either in the pleadings or in the evidence, on the ground of non-performance of necessary ceremonies of the marriage, once the factum of marriage is proved, everything necessary to validate such marriage, including the observance of essential ceremonies, shall be presumed.[2]

6. REBUTTABLE PRESUMPTIONS

Under the Bengal Tenancy Act 8 of 1885, Section 10BB, the Calcutta High Court, held that the presumption of correctness of the entries in record of rights, has to be made, though they do not create or extinguish title, but the presumption can be rebutted by evidence.[3] Presumption under Section 113-A of the Evidence Act is rebuttable.[4]

In regard to the report of a public analyst, when it is proved that the seal was intact, presumption has to be drawn as to the observance of required formalities thereto.[5]

7. IRREBUTTABLE PRESUMPTIONS

The Supreme Court, while dealing with Schedule 3, Rule 3 of Citizenship Rules of 1956, held that the rule which makes it obligatory on the enquiring authority to infer the acquisition of citizenship of a foreign country from the fact that the passport of a foreign country has been obtained by an Indian Citizen, is a "rule of evidence" and falls within the scope of Section 9(2) of the Citizenship Act, 1955, which authorises "rules of evidence" to be made, and the challenge to its validity on the ground that it is a rule of substantive law must, therefore, fail.

The decision contains an elaborate discussion about presumptions, rebuttable as well as irrebuttable. After referring to the views of several jurists and writers like Holdsworth, Wigmore, Phipson, Stephen and Dicey, the Supreme Court observed that their views do not disclose an identity of approach and their conclusions show different shades of opinion.

The Supreme Court observed: "In deciding the question as to whether a rule about irrebuttable presumption is a rule of evidence or not, the proper approach to adopt would be to consider whether fact 'A' from the proof of which a presumption is required to be drawn about the existence of fact 'B', is inherently relevant in the matter of proving fact 'B' and has inherently and probative or persuasive value in that behalf or not. If fact 'A' is inherently relevant in proving the existence of fact 'B', and to any rational mind it would bear a probative or persuasive value in the matter of proving the existence of fact 'B', then a rule prescribing either a rebuttable presumption or an irrebuttable presumption in that behalf would be a rule of evidence. On the other hand, if fact 'A' is inherently not relevant in proving the existence of fact 'B' or has no probative value in that behalf, and yet a rule is made prescribing for a rebuttable or an irrebutable presumption in that connection, that rule would be of substantive law and not a rule of evidence. Therefore, in dealing with the question as to whether a given rule prescribing a conclusive presumption is a rule of evidence or not, the view that all rules prescribing irrebuttable presumptions are rules of substantive law cannot be adopted. The question can only be answered after examining the rule and its impact on the proof of facts 'A' and 'B'."

A passport obtained by a person from a foreign country is relevant in an enquiry as to the citizenship of the person holding the passport. Applying the test laid down above to Sch. 3, R. 3, it must therefore be held that the impugned rule is a rule of evidence and not a rule of substantive law. As such, it would be within the scope of the authority conferred on the Central Government by Section 9(2).

The Supreme Court held that there can be no doubt that, the expression "rules of evidence" construed in the light of the Indian legal and legislative history would include some rules of conclusive proof and if that is so, it would be idle to contend that the impugned rule is a part of the substantive law merely because it prescribes a conclusive presumption. Therefore, on this construction of Section 9(2), the impugned rule must be held to be intra vires.[6]

8. CONCLUSIVE PROOF

Section 3 of this Act defines 'Evidence'. The word 'Conclusive Evidence' is not defined, but in this section it is stated "When one fact is declared by this Act to be conclusive proof of another, the Court shall, on proof of one fact, regard the other as proved, and shall not allow evidence to be given for the purpose of disproving it". Thus an artificial probative effect is given by the law to certain facts and no evidence is allowed to be produced with a view to combating that effect. Generally, this type of cases occurs when it is against the policy of the Government or it is in the interest of society.[7]

The Supreme Court in Somawanti v. State,[8] held that there is no difference between 'Conclusive Proof' and 'Conclusive Evidence', the aim of the two expressions being to give a finality to the establishment of the existence of a 'Fact'.[9]

The voters list prepared under the Gujarat Municipalities Act (34 of 1964), is conclusive proof of the right of a voter to vote.[10]

The statement in an order of the Court is conclusive of what happened before the Presiding Officer of that Court.[11]

The declaration made under the Land Acquisition Act under Section 6, is conclusive.[12]

Marriage certificate under special Marriage Act is conclusive proof of solemmization of marriage under the Act.[13] The certificate issued by the Director of the Central Food Laboratory is the conclusive proof of the facts stated therein and his examination as a witness is not permissible.[14] Certificate of purchase issued by the Taluka Board is the conclusive proof of assignment to the tenant of the right, title and interest of the landowner over the holding or the portion thereon to which the assignment relates, which can be discarded only if it is inaccurate on its face or is procured collusively.[15]

The fact that a child was born during the continuance of a valid marriage, is conclusive proof of the fact that the child is legitimate child of the husband, unless it is shown that the parties to the marriage had no access to each other at any time. When the child was born on 2-8-1980 and the wife stated that she visited the husband on 28-12-1979 and had sexual intercourse that night and when the husband failed to prove non-access, it was held that the Court shall on proof of one fact regard the other as proved, and shall not allow evidence to be given for purpose of dis-proving it.[16]

9. NOT CONCLUSIVE PROOF

There is no compulsive presumption in regard to an entry made by a public servant in the discharge of his official duties about a fact in issue or relevant fact.[17]

Registration of a partnership under the Partnership Act of 1932, is not conclusive proof of the existence of a partnership.[18]

The Court is not bound to treat the registration endorsement as conclusive proof of execution of a document, if circumstances of the execution are suspicious.[19]

Under the W. Bengal Land Reforms Act and Urban Land Ceiling and Regulation Act, for the purpose of exclusion of agricultural lands, it was held that the mere entry in the revenue and land records classifying the land as agricultural is not by itself sufficient to decide that land is being used mainly for purpose of agriculture, and to justify its exclusion from the operation of the Act, it must be decided whether, in fact, it was used mainly for the purpose of agriculture.[20]

Under the U.P. Pure Food Rules of 1952, it was held that the presumption under rule 10 flowing out of a certificate of public analyst is not conclusive, but a rebuttable presumption.[21]

The date of birth noted in the form for admission in a school, is not conclusive.[22]

Entries in the electoral roll or of age mentioned therein cannot be treated as conclusive piece of evidence for the dominating persons get the names of even minors entered in it.[23]

10. BURDEN OF PROOF

"The term 'burden of proof,' standing alone, is . . . . . somewhat ambiguous. It may refer to the obligation of a party to prove a fact in issue, or to the obligation of a party to adduce enough evidence to prove necessary evidential facts."[24]

"The burden of proof has been described as "Whose task is it to establish a fact?" . . . . . "[25]

The American scholar Thayer mentioned the use of the phrase 'burden of proof' in two main senses :

> "The peculiar duty of him who has the risk of any given proposition on which parties are at issue—who will lose the case if he does not make this proposition out, when all has been said and done.
> The duty of going forward in an argument or in producing evidence, whether at the beginning of a case, or at any later moment throughout the trial or discussion."[26]

"The term encompasses two separate burdens of proof. One burden is that of producing evidence, satisfactory to the judge, of a particular fact in issue. The second is the burden of persuading the trier of fact that the alleged fact is true."[27]

"The phrase "burden of proof" is used to describe the duty which lies on one or other of the parties either to establish a case or to establish the facts upon a particular issue."[28]

The normal rule is that the burden of proof lies on the party who alleges a fact. The party can, however, take advantage of presumption which may be available to him.[29]

In a case where a doctor failed to conduct an emergency operation and as a result the patient died, it was held that in such cases, consent of the patient who submits to such an operation is implicit and the doctor who fails to perform the emergency operation must prove satisfactorily that the patient refused to undergo the operation not only at the initial stage but also even after the patient was informed about the dangerous consequence of not undergoing the operation.[30]

Where a suit was filed by an illiterate lady for cancellation of a gift deed on the ground that it was obtained by fraud, the fact that she was illiterate and a widow, was undisputed. It was held that the burden of proof is on the person to show that the deed was valid.[31]

CHAPTER II

OF THE RELEVANCY OF FACTS

Evidence may be given of facts in issue and relevant facts

S. 5. Evidence may be given in any suit or proceeding of the existence or non-existence of every fact in issue and of such other facts as are hereinafter declared to be relevant, and of no others.

Explanation.*—This section shall not enable any person to give evidence of a fact which he is disentitled to prove by any provision of the law for the time being in force relating to Civil Procedure.[1]

ILLUSTRATIONS

(a) A is tried for the murder of B by beating him with a club with the intention of causing his death.

At A's trial the following facts are in issue:—

A's beating B with the club;

A's causing B's death by such beating;

A's intention to cause B's death.

(b) A suitor does not bring with him and have in readiness for production at the first hearing of the case, a bond on which he relies. This section does not enable him to produce the bond or prove its contents at a subsequent stage of the proceedings, otherwise than in accordance with the conditions prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE, OBJECT AND SCOPE

This section deals with the right to produce evidence, in any suit or proceedings, relating to the existence or non-existence of every fact in issue, and also to prove such other facts which may be declared relevant to the fact in issue, by virtue of the provisions contained in Sections 6 to 55. The object of this section is to restrict the investigation made by Courts within the bounds prescribed by general convenience. Of no fact can evidence be given unless it be either a fact in issue or one declared relevant under the following sections. Thus, evidence of all collateral facts, which are incapable of affording any reasonable presumption as to the principal matters in dispute, is excluded to save public time.

This section excludes everything not convered by some other succeeding section. The last four words of the section 'and of no others' preclude a party from providing any facts, not in issue or not declared relevant by any of the remaining sections of this Chapter. To establish the relevancy of any fact, it must be shown that it is a fact in issue or fact such as is declared to be relevant.—'Facts.. declared to be relevant'. The relevant facts are all those facts which are in the eye of the law so connected with or related to the facts in issue that they render the latter probable or improbable.

Section 3 says that one fact is relevant to another when the one is connected with the other in any of the ways referred to in this Chapter. Relevancy is thus fully explained in Ss. 6-11. "These sections enumerate specifically the different instances of the connection between cause and effect which occur most frequently in judicial proceedings. They are designedly worded very widely, and in such a way as to overlap each other. Thus a motive for a fact in issue (S. 8) is part of its cause (S. 7); subsequent conduct influenced by it (S. 8) is part of its effect (S. 7). Facts relevant under S. 11 would, in most cases, be relevant under the other section."[2]

The object of this Chapter is to point out in what cases collateral facts are relevant.

2. FACTS IN ISSUE AND RELEVANT FACTS

This expression is defined in Section 3 as including any fact from which either by itself or in connection with other facts, the existence, non-existence, nature and extent of any right, liability or disability asserted or denied in any suit or proceeding necessarily follows. In Civil Cases the facts in issue arise out of the pleadings by the parties, by assertion of the facts by one party and controverted by the other party. Such disputed facts would be drawn up by the Court under the Civil Procedure Code from the issues framed for determination in the suit.[3]

In Criminal Cases, the Court draws the facts given out by the prosecution, which constitute an offence against the accused person. Only such of those facts relevant to the offence would form a charge against the accused. While framing the charges concerning the offences alleged, the Court briefly points out the facts which constitute the particular offence.

The expression 'relevant' is also defined in Section 3 of this Act. One fact is said to be relevant to another when the one is connected with the other in any of the ways referred to in the provisions of this Act, relating to the relevancy of the facts. Under Chapter-2 of this Act, Section 5 relates to all facts in issue, whereas Section 6-55, deal with collateral facts. A perusal of the title of each section, (that is, Ss. 6-55) would show which fact is made relevant under this Act.

3. "AND OF NO OTHERS"

The last four words 'and of no others' in the section clearly point out that the party to the proceeding is prohibited from proving any fact which is not in issue or not declared relevant by any of the provisions of the Act. The section excludes everything which is not covered by the purview of some other section which follows in te Statute."[4]

There must be a specific provision before facts can be treated as relevant and facts must also be proved as laid down in the Act.[5]

Any one who wants to give evidence of a particular fact must show that it is admissible under some one or other of the following sections. The words "and of no others" impliedly impose a dupy on the Court to exclude evidence of irrelevant facts, irrespective of objections by the parties. In Criminal proceedings this duty was expressly imposed by old Criminal Procedure Code, Section 298. (Omitted by the Code of 1973). (Re: Civil proceedings, see the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, O. XIII, R. 3).[6]

4. ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE

According to the practice in England, all facts are admissible: subject to two conditions, viz., (1) the best evidence connecting the fact in issue is admissible. (2) No hearsay evidence is admissible. Under the present Act only facts directly connected with the fact in issue and such other facts which are declared relevant can be pleaded by the party. It may be noted here, that there are certain other facts which are not covered by Sections 6-55, which may have to be elicited for the purpose of discrediting a witness, by showing his previous statements which are inconsistent with the statements made in that particular case, or to prove the untrustworthiness of a witness.[7]

In a case of murder, it was held by the Supreme Court that the opinion of the prosecuting officers that some of the witnesses were responsible for the murder and not the accused, had no relevancy and should not have been placed on record in the case.[8] The age of a witness noted at the top of the deposition is not part of the evidence since it is not recorded on oath and hence it is not relevant to prove his age.[9]

In an enquiry for fixing the price of a groveland under the Land Acquisition Act, it was held that the evidence of a witness who offered a price for purchasing it prior to acquisition is relevant and acceptable.[10] Opinion as to handwriting can be proved by producing the photograph taken by the expert if the original is not forthcoming and photograph is a relevant fact.[11] In a case where corrupt practice was alleged in an election petition under the Representation of People Act, circumstantial evidence in respect of facts constituting corrupt practice, was held to be relevant.[12]

The fact that a document was procured by improper or even illegal means will not be a bar to its admissibility if it is relevant and its genuineness proved. But while examining its genuineness the circumstances under which it can be produced into Court have to be taken into consideration.[13] The Court is not concerned how the evidence was gathered or from where it was secured. It cannot reject evidence that is the outcome of an unauthorised investigation or by improper illegal means. It is concerned only whether the evidence is relevant to the matters in issue and if so whether admissible. An eminent judge once observed: 'It matters not how you get it; if you steal it even, it would be admissible.'.[14]

Where the written F.I.R. was admitted in evidence without examining its author and the defence made no objection to it, the accused could not contend that the prosecution case be disbelieved for such non-proving.[15]

5. INADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE

Where the prosecution failed to prove that the seized article, containing finger prints, was not tampered before sending to the Bureau and the specimen finger prints were not taken before a Magistrate and the seized article was not produced and exhibited, conviction could not be based on the finger print report.[16] Where the Police Officer, conducting the search and effecting the seizure, could not be better than a complainant, violated the principles of criminal jurisprudence by himself conducting the investigation, the documents of search and seizure were inadmissible in evidence.[17]

6. RELEVANCY AND ADMISSIBILITY

"The prime requirement of anything sought to be admitted in evidence is that it is of sufficient relevance. What is relevant (namely what goes to the proof or disproof of a matter in issue) will be decided by logic and human experience, and facts may be proved directly or circumstantially. But while no matter should be proved which is not relevant, some things which are relevant by the normal tests of logic may not be proved because of exclusionary rules of evidence. Such matters are inadmissible. Admissible evidence is thus that which is (1) relevant and (2) not excluded by any rule of law or practice.

See also PHIPSON ON EVIDENCE 15th Edition (2000), Page 106, para 6-05 "Relevancy and Admissibility".

Relevancy and admissibility are not the same. All admissible evidence is relevant but all relevent evidence is not admissible. Relevancy is thus the genus of which admissibility is the species. Though a fact may be relevant as it has connection with the fact in issue, still it may not be admissible, e.g., the communication between an advocate and his client. Sometimes relevancy may give rise to a presumption of admissibility, in which case the party objecting to it has to show that the fact though relevant is not admissible. In this connection it may be noted that Section 122 of this Act forbids disclosure of communication between wife and husband during marriage. Similarly S. 126, prohibits disclosure between a lawyer and a client.

In India, as in England, the test of admissibility of evidence lies in relevancy unless there is an express or necessarily implied prohibition in the Constitution or any other law.[19]

There is no provision of law which renders the statement of a witness produced by one accused inadmissible against the co-accused; but there are obvious reasons for receiving such evidence with great caution.[20]

Where a person was charged in one case for not filing a return on a certain date, he was found not guilty. In the second case he was charged for attempting to bribe the officer for accepting the return with an ante date. The question was whether the evidence of acquittal is relevant in the second case. It was held that it was relevant as the fact of failure to file the return was one of the important facts to be established in the second case.[21]

Merely because a village Ramoshi (officer) would be under the influence of the police, his evidence cannot be discarded as not relevant, on any justifiable ground.[22]

7. DISTINCTION BETWEEN RELEVANCY AND PROOF

Relevancy of facts has to be determined according to the pleadings of the parties, relating to the facts in issue. But proof is the procedure by which the relevant or admissible facts have to be proved. Under Section 136 of the Act, the Court is given the power to question the parties as to how the facts placed by them would be relevant and if the court is satisfied it can admit the evidence as admissible. So also the Court decides the relevancy of a fact. And it can also prescribe the mode of proof by which a fact can be proved.

8. OBJECTION TO PROOF

If objection as to the mode of proof of a document, is not raised when it was tendered, it would be deemed that objection was waived. Their Lordships of the Privy Council in Gopaldas v. Sri Thakurji, (1943 PC 83) observed: "Where the objection to be taken is not that the document is in itself inadmissible but that the mode of proof put forward is irregular or insufficient, it is essential that the objection should be taken at the trial before the document is marked as an exhibit and admitted to the record. A party cannot lie over till the appeal stage and raise objection for the first time as to the mode of proof".[23] The party who had given consent or waived the objection which he would have taken, cannot object to it at a later stage.[24]

The Court should take care to find out, when a document is produced, whether it is genuine and free from tampering or mutilation.[25]

9. OBJECTIONS TO THE ADMISSIBILITY HAVE TO BE DECIDED THEN AND THERE

It is proper for the Court to determine the questions as to admissibility of evidence as and when objection arise.[26]

The Court is to decide the question of admissibility of evidence (s. 136 infra). It would be decided as it arises and should not be reserved until judgment in the case is given. The moment a witness commences giving evidence which is inadmissible, he should be stopped by the Court. A party objecting to a question must do so as soon as it is stated and before the answer is given. When an irrelevant document is tendered, an objection should be made at that time. If it is not taken in time, it is considered to be waived. A party filing a document cannot urge its inadmissibility when the opposite party seeks to use it against him.[27] The moment a witness commences giving evidence which is inadmissible the witness should be stopped by the Court, even if there is no objection raised by the opposite parties.[28] On the same lines, it was held that the duty of a judge is to disallow inadmissible evidence when no objection is taken, and the judge should stop such questions himself without waiting for an objection to be taken as to its admissibility.[29]

10. WHEN ADMISSIBLE AND INADMISSIBLE PORTIONS ARE MIXED

When the evidence is tendered, it is the duty of the Court to decide the legally admissible evidence. If a document contains both admissible and inadmissible portions (e.g. because of some recitals relating to property which requires registration) and if they are severable, then legally admissible portion can only be taken. If they are not separable and so intermixed, the entire evidence has to be rejected.[30]

11. DUTY OF COURT TO GIVE REASONS FOR ADMISSIBILITY

It is always advisable to give at least brief reasons either for admissibility or inadmissibility of the evidence tendered, though detailed reasoning may be given in the judgment, so that the appellate court can appreciate the question of admissibility.[31]

12. OBJECTIONS TO RELEVANCY

It is the primary duty of the Court to exclude an irrelevant fact whether there is objection by the party or not as to its admissibility. Section 298 of the old Criminal Procedure Code (now omitted in Act 2 of 1974) laid down that it was a duty of a judge to exclude inadmissible evidence, whether it is or is not objected to by the parties. So far as Civil Cases are concerned a combined reading of Sections 60, 64 and the first proviso to Section 165 would show that only admissible evidence has to be taken by the Court. As the question of admissibility is a pure question of law, it is the duty of the court to exclude inadmissible evidence because it has to deliver the judgment in the case basing upon facts declared by this Act to be relevant and duly proved. It was held by the Madras High Court that a judgment based on irrelevant evidence is not sustainable.[32] In that particular case, evidence was given before a registering officer by consent of parties, though the conditions in Section 33 of this Act were not fulfilled. But in a subsequent decision it was held that the provisions of Section 33 of this Act may be waived.[33] The principle that a judgment based on irrelevant facts or inadmissible facts cannot be sustained, still holds good. If the court failed in its duty in avoiding irrelevant and inadmissible facts it would lead to miscarriage of justice and the ends of justice would get defeated.[34]

Objection to relevancy can be raised in appeal even though evidence was admitted without any objection in the trial court. If the evidence is irrelevant, the consent of the parties cannot make it relevant.[35]

It was held by the Andhra Pradesh High Court that where a question of title was involved and when both parties did not raise objection to oral evidence, they could not take any objection in second appeal.[36]

13. WAIVER OF OBJECTION OR CONSENT OF PARTIES

Basically, proof being a matter of procedure, the parties may by consent or waiver allow evidence being admitted by the Court. So far as the Civil Cases are concerned the parties by consent can validate the procedure recording the evidence by the court.[37] The parties can agree to the reception without proof of recitals in a judgment as to the contents of a document. The parties cannot afterwards object to the admissibility of the recitals in the judgment.[38]

There is difference between waiving the necessity of formal proof of a document and objecting to the admission of a document which is per se inadmissible.[39] Document per se inadmissible cannot become admissible by consent, as the admissibility is a question of law.[40]

14. CRIMINAL CASES—WAIVER OF CONSENT

So far as the criminal cases are concerned, the general principle is that the accused person cannot give consent on any thing or waive even the procedure in the trial against him, unless any law expressly permits waiver. It is the duty of the Criminal Court to follow the procedure prescribed by law, and his right cannot be held to be lost by his consent to a procedure.[41]

In this connection it is useful to note Section 58, of this Act, wherein it is stated that no fact need be proved in any proceeding which the parties thereto or their agents agree to admit at the hearing or which before the hearing they agree to admit by any writing under their hands, or which by any rule of pleading in force at the time they are deemed to have admitted by their pleadings. The proviso states that the court may, in its discretion, require the facts admitted to be proved otherwise than by such admissions. One view is that this section applies only to civil matters. Another view is that it applies to both civil and criminal matters.

Especially in Criminal cases in which a good number of illiterate people are involved, a heavy duty is cast on the lawyers appearing for them in making admissions on behalf of the accused, because the accused is under no obligation to make an admission to anything, and that no implied authority can be presumed in favour of a lawyer to make admissions against the interest of his client, who is the accused in the case. When a lawyer puts up a plea in the case, the accused is entitled to the benefit of such plea, but it cannot be said that the plea or the defence taken up by the lawyer must bind the accused.[42] Except the plea of the accused that he is guilty of the offence, no other admission dispensing with proof is permitted in a criminal trial.[43] It was held that no consent or admission by the prisoner's advocate to dispense with a medical witness (advocate admitted the postmortem certificate) can relieve the prosecution of proving, by adducing evidence as to the nature of injuries received by the deceased, and that the injuries were the cause of the death of the person, for which the prisoner is charged with the offence of murder.[44]

This explanation prohibits a party from claiming any relief upon facts or documents not stated or referred to by him in his pleadings. Illustration (b) elucidates the meaning of the Explanation.

Relevancy of facts forming part of same transaction.

S. 6. Facts which, though not in issue, are so connected with a fact in issue as to form part of the same transaction, are relevant, whether they occurred at the same time and place or at different times and places.

ILLUSTRATIONS

(a) A is accused of the murder of B by beating him. Whatever was said or done by A or B or the by-standers at the beating, or so shortly before or after it as to form part of the transaction, is a relevant fact.

(b) A is accused of waging war against the Government of India by taking part in an armed insurrection in which property is destroyed, troops are attacked, and gaols are broken open. The occurrence of these facts is relevant, as forming part of the general transaction, though A may not have been present at all of them.

(c) A sues B for a libel contained in a letter forming part of a correspondence. Letters between the parties relating to the subject out of which the libel arose, and forming part of the correspondence in which it is contained, are relevant facts, though they do not contain the libel itself.

(d) The question is, whether certain goods ordered from B were delivered to A. The goods were delivered to several intermediate persons successively. Each delivery is a relevant fact.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE, OBJECT AND SCOPE

This section deals with the relevancy of facts forming part of the same transaction. Facts, though not in issue, if they are so connected with a fact in issue as to form part of the same transaction, are relevant, whether those facts occurred at the same time and place or at different times and places. This and the following sections deal with circumstantial evidence. Sections 7, 8 and 9 explain and illustrate this section. Section 7 deals with a fact which is the occasion, cause or effect, immediate or otherwise, of relevant facts or facts in issue. Section 8, deals with motive, preparation, and previous and subsequent conduct of the person, which has reference to any fact in issue or relevant thereto, whereas Section 9, states such of those facts as are necessary to explain or introduce a fact in issue or relevant facts, or which support or rebut an inference suggested by the fact in issue or relevant facts etc. are relevant. Section 14 deals with the facts showing the existence of any state of mind, such as, intention, knowledge, good faith, negligence, rashness, ill will, or good will etc. when the existence of such state of mind etc. is in issue or relevant. All these facts are only collateral facts forming a chain encircling the facts in issue.

This section admits those facts the admissibility of which comes under the technical expression res gestae (i.e. the things done, including words spoken in the course of a transaction), but such facts must 'form part of the same transaction.'[45]

In Babulal v. W.I.T. Ltd.,[46] it was observed that the statement of law in Section 6 is usually known as the rule of res gestae, the essence of which doctrine is that the facts, which, though not in issue are so connected with the facts in issue as to form part of the same transaction, that they become relevant like the fact in issue.[47]

In HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, 4th Ed., Vol. 17, para. 6, page 8, it is stated: "Items of evidence are sometimes said to be part of the res gestae[48], owing to the nature and strength of their connection with the matters in issue, and as such are admissible. "Res gestae" is an expression mainly of utility in the criminal law concerning the contemporaneity of statements to incidents[49], but, in so far as contemporaneous statements are relevant and accompany and explain matters in issue, they will be admissible.[50]

In HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, 4th Ed., Vol.17, para 31, page 25, it is stated: "There is a distinction to be made between the bare facts in issue, and the issue of circumstance and facts which surround them. These surrounding circumstances have sometimes been spoken of as the res gestae[51], but it is more accurate and satisfactory to limit that expression to those items of evidence relating to contemporaneous or almost contemporaneous statements which are admitted under the doctrine of the res gestae, although they are otherwise inadmissible as infringing what is left of the rule against hearsay.[52] As to the rule against hearsay, see paras 53 et seq., post. Facts, as opposed to statements, of which the truth is in issue, which make up the surrounding circumstances are admissible insofar as they are relevant, and witnesses are naturally expected to give their evidence with reasonable fulness of detail and circumstance.[53]

This principle of 'res gestae' was explained by 'LORD NORMAND' in Teper v. R.[54] in which case a husband set fire to a shop of his wife. A police constable heard a woman shouting 'Your place burning and you going away from the fire'. The constable in his evidence stated that he saw a car in which there was a man resembling the accused. His hearing those words was from a burning shop and nearly half an hour after the fire started. Dealing with those facts it was observed 'Nevertheless the rule admits of certain carefully safeguarded and limited, exceptions, one of which is, that the words may be proved when they form part of the res gestae..... It appears to rest ultimately on two propositions—that human utterance is both a fact and a means of communication, and that human action may be so interwoven with words that the significance of the action cannot be understood without the correlative words and the dissociation of the words from the action would impede the discovery of truth.' It was held that words to be admissible as words explaining an act to form part of res gestae, their utterance must, if not absolutely contemporaneous with action, be atleast so closely associated with it in time, place and circumstances, that they are part of the thing being done. It was further held that the hearsay evidence of identification in criminal proceedings is inadmissible.

2. TRANSACTION—MEANING OF

SIR JAMES STEPHEN defined the term 'transaction' as a group of facts so connected together as to be referred to by a single name, as a crime, contract, a wrong or any other subject of enquiry which may be in issue.

According to TAYLOR, it includes everything that may be fairly considered an incident of the event under discussion.[55]

If facts form part of the transaction which is the subject of enquiry, manifestly evidence of them ought not to be excluded. The question is whether they do form part, or are too remote to be considered really part of the transaction before the Court. A transaction is a group of facts so connected together as to be referred to by a single legal name, as a crime, a contract, a wrong or any other subject of inquiry which may be in issue. Every fact which is part of the same transaction as the fact in issue is deemed to be relevant to the fact in issue, although it may not be actually in issue, and although, if it were not part of the same transaction it might be excluded as hearsay.[56]

A transaction consists both of the physical acts and the words accompanying such physical acts, whether spoken by the person doing such acts, the person to whom they were done or any other person or persons. Such words are admissible in evidence as parts of a transaction.

Illus. (a) under this section shows that what is said and done by the accused A and the victim B, at the time of the incident, if given out by the by-standers, form part of the same transaction and becomes relevant. The statement as that in Illus. (a) is relevant only if it is that of a person who has seen the actual occurrence and who uttered it simultaneously with the incident or so soon thereafter as to make it reasonably certain that the speaker is still under the stress of the excitement caused by his having seen the incident. What is admissible under this section is a fact which is connected with the fact in issue as 'part of the same transaction'. A transaction may consist of a single incident occupying a few minutes or it may be spread over a variety of facts, etc. occupying a much longer time and occurring on different occasions or at different places. Where the transaction consists of different acts, in order that the chain of such acts may constitute the same transaction, they must be connected together by proximity of time, proximity or unity of place, continuity of action and community of purpose or design.[57]

Illustration (b) indicates that acts done at different places and times may form part of the same transaction.

A transaction in its ordinary sense is some business or dealing which is carried on or transacted between two or more persons.[58] Such of those statements made whether at the same time and place or at different times and places, as are connected with a fact in issue also form part of the same transaction.[59]

59. Krishna Ram Das v. State, AIR 1964 Assam 53.

Facts leading to circumstances as to the nearness of the place, continuity of the act and the purpose or design have been considered as part of the same transaction.[60]

The word 'transaction' is used in a limited sense in illus, (a), but it is used in a wider sense in the remaining illustrations, under the section.[61]

Where children of the deceased were heard crying and saying that their mother was being killed, it was held that such statements of children can be admitted under this section.[62] When a witness stated that he was told by other witnesses that the accused was beating the deceased at about the time of occurrence, it was held that such evidence was admissible as part of res gestae.[63] Where the accused had informed his father that the deceased had had a hand in the disappearence of his son and he also threatened the victim on an earlier occasion and subsequently it was found that the victim died in a furnace, the statements of the accused to his father soon after the murder was held admissible by the Supreme Court.[64] Where there is a tape-recorded conversation between the accused and the complainant which was recorded when the police was not there, and the voices were identified, it was held that such contemporaneous conversation was admissible.[65] A spontaneous utterance by the accused at the time of the crime is admissible as res gestae.[66] Statements given by the accused at the moment when the offence is committed were held to be admissible under this section.[67] So also threats given by the accused to the deceased.[68]

The only evidence against an accused charged with having voluntarily caused grievous hurt was a statement made in the presence of the accused by the person injured to a third person, immediately after the commission of the offence. The accused did not, when the statement was made, deny that she had done the act complained of. It was held that the evidence was admissible under this section and Section 8, Illus. (g).[69]

Statements of the injured immediately after the incident giving out the name of the accused come within this section.[70] Where the injured narrated the incident when the knife was still stuck on his back and the testimony of the prosecution witness was based on the said narration, it was held that it was not hearsay evidence but a part of res gestae under Section 6.[71] Where on hearing the sound of gunshots from the house of the victim, his neighbours rush to the spot within minutes and he told them the names of the assailants who had shot at him and his wife, his statement to them was relevant under this section.[72]

Where there was some appreciable interval between the acts of incendiarism indulged in by the miscreants and the Judicial Magistrate recording the statements of the victims, that interval blocks the statements from acquiring legitimacy under this section as forming part of res gestae evidence.[73] The statement of a witness that he was informed by other witnesses and also learnt from the accused that the accused murdered the deceased cannot be admitted as part of res gestae.[74] A statement of a girl to her mother after coming back home, that she was raped, is not admissible under Section 6.[75]

In Chander Kala v. Ram Kishan,[76] a teacher reported an incident between her and the headmaster to her colleagues the next day. The Supreme Court without deciding whether the conduct of Chandra Kala in narrating the incident to her colleagues was res gestae, observed that even assuming it is not res gestae and hence inadmissible under Section 6, it was admissible under Section 157 as it was corroborated by her colleagues who gave evidence.[77]

In Kappinnaiah's case 1931 Mad 233 the raped woman reported to her mother-in-law shortly after ravishment and 4 days later she died in a canal. The lower court convicted the accused stating that the statement of the ravished woman was relevant u/s. 6, 8 and 32 of this Act. The High Court in the appeal set aside the conviction and relying on Regina v. Lillyman,[78] held that the statement of the victim is no part of res gestae under Section 6 and that as the rape was not the cause of death as she took 3 days to commit suicide Section 32 cannot be attracted. The particulars of the complaint are not evidence of the facts complained of but as evidence of the consistency of the conduct of the prosecutrix with her evidence on the witness box and as negativing consent on her part since she having died did not give evidence, the complaint was not admissible under Section 8.

In a bride burning case, the conduct of the husband after the incident is relevant.[79]

The Privy Council has held that the particulars in any complaint made by the outraged female immediately and directly after the commission of the offence, are admissible, not as evidence or corroboration of the fact complained, but as evidence of the credibility of the complainant and also to negative the defence plea of consent.[80]

If another offence has a nexus with the main offence then evidence relating to the other offence becomes relevant as forming part of the same transaction, e.g.—main offence of murder—the other offence is the disposal of the dead body to suppress the evidence of murder. Evidence of the latter offence becomes admissible.[81]

Letters written during the course of negotiations for the purpose of a licence in regard to a land are admissible.[82] The execution of a deed of adoption is part of the transaction of adoption itself and is relevant under this section.[83] A statement made by the executant of a will at the time of registration is admissible.[84]

3. "SAME TRANSACTION"—IN Cr.P.C.

In Section 235 and Section 239 of the old Criminal Procedure Code which correspond to Sections 220 and 298 respectively of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the expression 'same transaction' is used. While dealing with the expression it was held that it includes immediate cause and effect of an act or event, and is so connected with all the relevant circumstances, like reasonable distance of time and space.[85] The expression denotes two facts occurring at the same time and place, though they may not have any connection between them, but may be parts of the same transaction, e.g. the fact of committing an offence and the fact of destroying the evidence relating to the offence.[86]

The proximity of time, nearness of the place, continuity of action, and community of purpose and design for the offence are the factors one should have in mind to determine whether the facts form part of the same transaction.[87] To form a particular statement as a part of the same transaction, utterances must be simultaneous with the incident or soon after it so as to make it reasonably certain that the speaker is still under stress of excitement in respect of the transaction in question, otherwise it would be irrelevant.[88] If the statement is made to any authority who is competent to investigate the fact, it is admissible irrespective of long lapse of time but if it is made to a person not having that authority, it should be made contemporaneous with the occurrence, though mere gap of a few days, in the circumstances of a case, may not render it inadmissible. The test in such situations is whether the witness had an opportunity to concoct or to be tutored. In the instant case, the accused/approver along with others committed rape on the victim and murdered her on 9-6-1987 and gave evidence in support of the prosecution. He stated that on the third day of the occurrence he went to the house of his brother-in-law and stayed there for six days and then he went to another place where he got a job in a tea shop. On 24-6-1987 he happened to notice his photo in a Tamil daily and then he rushed back to his brother-in-law's house and confessed his guilt to him. There being nothing to indicate that the accused was either tutored or influenced by anybody during the period, his statement was admissible under this section.[89]

Where the witnesses snatched away the lathi from the accused while he was assaulting his father with it and subsequently they snatched away the katari after he assaulted his daughter with the same, the act of the accused assaulting his daughter would be relevant and admissible under this section though the witnesses did not see the actual assault on her.[90] In a case an illegitimate child claimed maintenance from his alleged father who denied paternity. The mother, against whom there were no allegations regarding any moral lapses, convened a panchayat and the panchayatdars ordered the alleged father to pay money and some paddy to the child. The conduct of the mother, the alleged father and the panchayatdars are the relevant facts under this section.[91]

Where the accused of rape and strangulation begged forgiveness and pleaded it to be his first mistake on being caught while running away, these facts were relevant as forming part of the same transaction.[92] Where the accused made statement regarding his assault on the deceased to the brother of the deceased within half an hour of the incident, the time being too short for any fabrication, such evidence was admissible under this section.[93] Where the assailant intruded into the victim's courtyard during the dead of night and she identified him, her pronouncement before death that the appellant was standing with a gun and his firing the gun at her, are the circumstances so intertwined with each other by proximity of time and space that the statement of the deceased became the part of the same transaction and was admissible under Section 6.[94] Where the witness deposed that immediately after the occurrence his niece told him that his wife was shot by the accused and he was threatening the persons on the spot that he would kill them also like the deceased victims, his evidence was admissible under this section.[95] Where the wife, set ablaze by her husband, told her brother, a witness to the occurrence, 'run away, he (husband) has put fire to me', her words form part of the same transaction.[96]

Under the old Cr.P.C., Section 235, it was held that mere common purpose cannot constitute "same transaction", but there must be facts linked together to form a continuity of the transaction.[97]

4. STATEMENTS OF BY-STANDERS

Statements of by-standers witnessing a transaction are relevant if they are made while the transaction is in progress or so shortly before or after it as to form part of the same transaction.[98] Where A was tried for the murder of B by shooting him, the facts that the person, then in the room, with B, saw a man with a gun in his hand pass a window opening into the room where B was shot, and thereupon exclaimed "there s Bucher" (a name by which A was known), were held to be relevant.[1] A husband, his father and mother were prosecuted for the murder of his wife. She cried out for help as soon as she was pushed into the room. Her children who were playing outside in the verandah exclaimed at the same time that their mother was being killed. The exclamations of children were received through the evidence of persons who heard them.[2] If a by-stander was present at the time of the incident, then his statement if made spontaneously soon after the incident is admissible as relevant.[3] Where a number of persons gathered immediately after the offence and were told by the eye-witnesses as to who were the culprits, it was held that their evidence was relevant.[4]

"By-standers" means all persons who were present at the time of the incident[5] and not the persons who gather at the place of occurrence after the event.

"In order to make the statement of a by-stander admissible it must have been made, as contemplated by Section 6 and illus. (a) to it, at the time the transaction was taking place, or so shortly before or after it as to form part of the transaction. If the transaction has terminated and then the statement is made, the statement is irrelevant. The admissibility is dependent on continuity."[6]

When it is stated by a witness that he went to the spot and heard the by-standers talking that the four persons had committed the murder, it was held his statement was inadmissible.[7]

5. OTHER THAN EYEWITNESSES

Any statement by persons other than the eye-witnesses would be hearsay, because they would have picked up the information from others.[8]

Where the said promissory note was executed by a pardanashin lady and evidence was led in that the note was taken by her husband in a room where his wife was sitting and it was brought back after obtaining the signature, it was held that the husband's statement that the signature on the pronote was that of his wife comes under Section 6.[9]

A declaration made subsequent to the occurrence is admissible provided it can be validly assumed that the existing influence continued.[10]

6. FACTS NOT SO CONNECTED AS TO FORM PART OF SAME TRANSACTION

Where a person was charged with forging a particular document, evidence that a number of documents apparently forged or held in readiness for the purpose of forgery, were found in the accused's possession, was held to be inadmissible.[11] The accused was charged with having received illegal gratifications from C&Co., on three occasions in 1876. In 1876, 1877 and 1878, C&Co. were doing business as commissariat contractors and the accused was the manager of the commissariat office. It was held that the evidence of similar but unconnected instances of receiving illegal gratifications from C&Co. in 1877 and 1878 was not admissible against him under Sections 5 to 13.[12] Evidence of witnesses who deposed that the deceased had made certain statements to them either nine months or even ten days prior to his murder was held inadmissible under the Section 7 or Section 8.[13]

Where the father of the accused informed the father of deceased wife of the accused that his son/accused had killed the deceased but there was no finding as to proximity of time of information to the incident, the statement of the father of the accused could not be considered as relevant under this section.[15]

7. FIRST INFORMATION REPORT

The first information report is not a substantive piece of evidence.[16]

But it can be used in the defence by the accused under Section 145 of this Act. It can be used by the prosecution for purpose of corroboration of the witness who gave that information.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE, OBJECT AND SCOPE

This section admits a very large class of facts connected with facts in issue or relevant facts, though not forming part of the transaction. Facts forming part of the same transaction are admissible under the preceding section. Evidence relating to collateral facts is admissible when such facts will, if established, establish reasonable presumption as to the matter in dispute and when such evidence is reasonably conclusive. The section provides for the admission of several classes of facts which are connected with the transaction under inquiry in particular modes, viz. (1) as being the occasion or cause of a fact; (2) as being its effect; (3) as giving opportunity for its occurrence; and (4) as constituting the state of things under which it happened.

A fact in issue cannot be proved by showing that facts similar to it, but not part of the same transaction, have occurred at other times. Thus, when the question is, whether a person has committed a crime, the fact that he had committed a similar crime before, is irrelevant.

Illustration (a) is an instance of facts relevant as giving occasion or opportunity, (b) of facts constituting an effect, (c) of facts constituting the state of things under which an alleged fact happened.

Where the accused took money from the deceased and on the day of the offence the deceased went to the accused to ask for the return of the money. It was held that those facts are relevant showing the occasion, cause or effect of the fact in issue.[17] Where footprints were found near the scene of offence and they also showed from which place they came or to which place they led it was held that the finding of those footprints at the place of occurrence is relevant under this section.[18]

2. TAPE-RECORDING

A contemporaneous tape-record of a relevant conversation is a relevant fact and is admissible under this section but such evidence must be received with caution.[19] There is no doubt that such evidence (tangible exhibits, such as photographs and tape-recordings) may be admitted, but there must be some foundational showing that the actual exhibit preferred is what it is represented to be.[20]

In all these cases (tape-recordings, film, video-tape and computer output) the evidence is real evidence when it is tendered to show what it was that was recorded. The relevance of what was recorded, and the operation of other exclusionary rules may determine ultimate admissibility. Thus if a recording were obtained illegally[21] or in breach of public policy[22] it might be rejected on these grounds, but not because it was a recording. If the matter recorded is itself in issue, then the recording is capable of constituting real evidence of it.[23]

Tape-records are admissible provided (1) the voice of the person is identified by the maker of the record; (2) accuracy of what was recorded is established and (3) the possibility of tampering with the record is ruled out; (4) the subject matter which was recorded must be shown as relevant.[24]

Besides the above three conditions for admission, the Supreme Court in Ramsingh v. Col Ramsingh,[25] after reviewing the case law including the decisions in R v. Maqsud,[26] and R v. Robson,[27] have placed further conditions for accepting tape-recorded evidence, viz, (1) the recorded statement must be sealed and kept in safe or official custody; (2) the voice of the speaker should be audible.

The Punjab High Court, in Dial Singh v. Rajpal[28] held that where the witness had denied his voice which was tape-recorded, recording of the voice of the witness for comparison and identification of his earlier recorded voice is not prohibited under any statute. Hence permission to record voice of the defendant in another cassette for the purpose of comparison with and identification of his earlier recorded voice, cannot be rejected only on the ground that there was a dispute as to whether the earlier cassette was original or not.[29]

Where a police officer recorded the conversation on telephone between two persons with the help of a recording instrument it was held that the recording is admissible; it would not come within the mischief of Section 162 CrPC.[30]

4. OTHER INSTANCES UNDER SECTION 7

Report of a court of enquiry under Air Craft Rules is also admissible.[32]

Short hand transcripts are admissible under this section.

Motive, preparation and previous or subsequent conduct.

S. 8. Any fact is relevant which shows or constitutes a motive or preparation for any fact in issue or relevant fact.

The conduct of any party, or of any agent to any party, to any suit or proceeding, in reference to such suit or proceeding, or in reference to any fact in issue therein or relevant thereto, and the conduct of any person an offence against whom is the subject of any proceeding, is relevant, if such conduct influences or is influenced by any fact in issue or relevant fact, and whether it was previous or subsequent thereto.

Explanation 1.*—The word "conduct" in this section does not include statements, unless those statements accompany and explain acts other than statements; but this explanation is not to affect the relevancy of statements under any other section of this Act.

Explanation 2.*—When the conduct of any person is relevant, any statement made to him or in his presence and hearing, which affects such conduct, is relevant.

The facts that A murdered C, that B knew that A had murdered C, and that B had tried to extort money from A by threatening to make his knowledge public, are relevant.

(b) A sues B upon a bond for the payment of money. B denies the making of the bond.

The fact that, at the time when the bond was alleged to be made, B required money for a particular purpose, is relevant.

(c) A is tried for the murder of B by poison.

The fact that, before the death of B, A procured poison similar to that which was administered to B, is relevant.

(d) The question is, whether a certain document is the will of A.

The facts that, not long before the date of the alleged will, A made inquiry into matters to which the provisions of the alleged will relate, that he consulted vakils in reference to making the will, and that he caused drafts of other wills to be prepared of which he did not approve, are relevant.

(e) A is accused of a crime.

The facts that, either before or at the time of, or after the alleged crime, A provided evidence which would tend to give to the facts of the case an appearance favourable to himself, or that he destroyed or concealed evidence, or prevented the presence or procured the absence of persons who might have been witnesses, or suborned persons to give false evidence respecting it, are relevant.

(f) The question is, whether A robbed B.

The facts that, after B was robbed, C said in A's presence—"the police are coming to look for the man who robbed B," and that immediately afterwards A ran away, are relevant.

(h) The question is, whether A committed a crime.

The fact that A absconded after receiving a letter warning him that inquiry was being made for the criminal, and the contents of the letter, are relevant.

(i) A is accused of a crime.

The facts that, after the commission of the alleged crime, he absconded, or was in possession of property or the proceeds of property acquired by the crime, or attempted to conceal things which were or might have been used in committing it, are relevant.

(j) The question is, whether A was ravished.

The facts that, shortly after the alleged rape, she made a complaint relating to the crime, the circumstances under which, and the terms in which the complaint was made, are relevant.

The fact that, without making a complaint, she said that she had been ravished is not relevant as conduct under this section, though it may be relevant as a dying declaration under Section 32, clause (1), or as corroborative evidence under Section 157.

(k) The question is, whether A was robbed.

The fact that, soon after the alleged robbery, he made a complaint relating to the offence, the circumstances under which, and the terms in which, the complaint was made, are relevant.

The fact that he said he had been robbed without making any complaint, is not relevant, as conduct under this section, though it may be relevant as a dying declaration under Section 32, clause (1), or as corroborative evidence under Section 157.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

The Evidence Act intends to make only those statements admissible which are the essential complement of acts done or refused to be done, so that the act itself or the omission to act acquires a special significance as a ground for inference with respect to the issues in the case under trial.[1]

This section embodies the rule that the testimony of res gestae is allowable when it goes to the root of the matter concerning the commission of a crime. Consequently, a verbal statement to a police-officer

1. Empress v. Rama Birappa, ILR (1878) 3 Bom 12, 17.

during the time of recovery of articles, upon the information of an accused in custody, is admissible in evidence.[2]

The section deals with mainly three aspects:

(1) A fact which shows or constitutes a motive for any fact in issue or relevant fact.

(2) The acts constituting preparation for any fact in issue or relevant fact.

(3) The conduct of the person either previous or subsequent to the offence.

Thus this section has a wider object than Section 7. Illuss. (a) and (b) are examples of showing motive. Illuss. (c) and (d) refer to preparatory stages; Illus (e) and (i) to the conduct of the accused; Illuss. (f), (g), and (h) are the statements affecting the conduct of the accused. Illuss. (j) and (k) are statements explaining and accompanying acts, which would form res gestae.

Under this section the motive which induces a party to do an act, or the preparation which he makes for its commission, will be taken into account. Evidence of motive or preparation becomes important when a case depends upon circumstantial evidence only.

2. MOTIVE

Motive is that which moves a man to do a particular act; there can be no action without a motive, which must exist for every voluntary act. Generally speaking, the voluntary acts of same persons have an impelling emotion or motive. Motive in the correct sense is the emotion supposed to have led to the act. It is often proved by the conduct of a person. "The ordinary feelings, passions and propensities under which parties act, are facts known by observation and experience; and they are so uniform in their operation that a conclusion may be safely drawn that, if a party acts in a particular manner, he does so under the influence of a particular motive."[3] The exchange of hot words by the accused two days prior to the incident, can be enough motive to kill a person and injure others[4] but usual quarrel due to drunkardness of the accused husband with his deceased wife has been held to be not a strong motive to kill her.[5]

Proof of presence of motive, preparation, opportunity or the previous attempts would be relevant as they go to show not only the mens rea in committing a crime but also provide sufficient information in establishing the commission of the offence.

PHIPSON brings out inferences from motive as follows: "Evidence of motive is generally admissible in criminal cases because it is thought to make it more likely that the crime was committed.[6] Such evidence can be relied on to establish both the actus reus and mens rea. Thus in R. v. Heeson,[7] evidence was led in the trial of a mother for poisoning her child shortly after its first birthday to show that the accused had insured her child's life and was entitled to claim 30 shillings if it died after its first birthday. Some doubt has been expressed as to whether the prosecution should be able to show motive where to do so will reveal previous criminal or discreditable behaviour by the accused. In R. v. Williams,[8] however, the Court of Appeal upheld the trial judge's decision to allow the prosecution in a case of a threat to kill to lead evidence that the accused bore the victim a grudge because he had previously been imprisoned for assaulting her.

7. (1878) 14 Cox CC 40, Chester Winter Assizes.

Some degree of counter-balance to the admissibility of evidence of motive is provided by the fact that an accused may lead evidence suggesting a lack of motive. Thus in R. v. Acott,[9] the defence led uncontradicted evidence that the accused was found of his mother."[10]

An emotion which leads to the commission of an act is motive. Motive and intention are two distinct matters and they are not one and the same. Intention was explained by the Madras High Court, as follows. The word 'intention' by its etymology seems to have a metaphorical allusion to archery and implies aim and thus connotes not a casual or a merely possible result—foreseen perhaps as not improbable incident but not desired but rather connotes the one object with which the effort is made and thus has a reference to what has been called a dominant motive without which the action would not have been taken."[11]

WHARTON states: "Motive and intent are not synonymous. Motive is the inducing cause, while intent is the purpose or mental state with which the criminal act is committed. Evidence of motive is always relevant and admissible although it is not necessary for the prosecution to offer evidence of motive.[12]

A motive is something which prompts a person to form an opinion or intention to do certain illegal act or even a legal act but with illegal means with a view to achieve that intention.[13]

Sometimes motive may be good but its intention may be bad. For example, if a man steals some food article his intention is bad, though the motive for stealing to save starvation of his children, may be good.

Proof of motive may be given directly or by inference from certain facts. Where the deceased had told her daughter within three days immediately prior to her death about her property dispute with the accused, motive could be inferred therefrom.[14] Where there is proof of absence of motive it may give rise to a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the accused.

Motive may create a very strong suspicion but it cannot take place of proof.[15] Mere possibility of existence of motive cannot make the accused guilty.[16]

Though the prosecution is not under an obligation to prove the motive for the offence, it lends support to the prosecution case if it is proved, though not by direct evidence but by circumstantial evidence. If motive is proved by the prosecution the Court has to consider it and see whether it is adequate. When motive is suggested by the prosecution, but is not proved, still it is necessary for the Court to consider the suggestion.[17]

3. WHEN MOTIVE LOSES ITS IMPORTANCE

The motive part of the prosecution case loses all its importance, when the prosecution is able to prove by clear, cogent, convincing and unimpeachable evidence the commission of the crime.[18] When the evidence of the eye-witnesses is found to be truthful, motive assumes a secondary role.[19] Where participation of the accused in the commission of offences is established by the evidence of the eye-witness, absence of motive pales into insignificance and cannot be a ground to justify his acquittal.[20] Where the evidence of the direct eye-witnesses is trustworthy and acceptable, motive does not assume much importance.[21] When once the court is satisfied about the guilt of the accused on the evidence placed, it need not consider the question of motive.[22] It is not a sine qua non for the success of the prosecution that the motive must be proved. So Long as other evidence remains convincing and is not open to reasonable dout, a conviction may well be based on it.[23]

While the accused was on bail pending a criminal case for kidnapping the victim and committing rape, a separate case was filed alleging that he committed the murder of the victim. It was held that a strong motive for the accused to commit murder was established by the evidence.[24]

Holding that when motive is equally balanced, the court had to look to surrounding circumstances in order to find out the truth followed.[25]

Where the prosecution alleged that the occurrence took place due to enmity between the deceased and the accused and the defence also attributed the foisting of prosecution due to the said enmity, it was held that, enmity being double edged weapon, motive does not assume any importance in the case of such nature.[26]

4. MOTIVE NOT AN INGREDIENT OF ANY OFFENCE

Motive is not an ingredient of any offence. But when it is proved it helps the Court to come to a correct conclusion where there is no direct evidence.[27] In State of Gujarat v. Anirudhsing,[28] it was held that, if motive is proved, that would supply a chain of links but absence thereof is not a ground to reject the prosecution. It is not necessary in each and every case to prove the motive. The prosecution is only required to show that a particular case falls within the domain of a particular section.[29] The absence of motive is a circumstance which is relevant for assessing the evidence. But, where the circumstantial evidence proves the guilt of the accused those circumstances are not weakened by the fact that the motive has not been established.[30]

Motive always is a satisfactory circumstance of corroboration, where there is convincing evidence. But it can never supply the want of reliable evidence.[31]

5. ABSENCE OF MOTIVE

The absence of motive cannot undo the direct testimony. Motive only supports the case.[32]

6. NON-PLEADING OF MOTIVE

Where in circumstantial evidence motive is not relied upon as a circumstance, its non-pleading is not fatal for the prosecution.[33]

7. FAILURE TO PROVE MOTIVE—WHETHER FATAL

Failure to give evidence as to the motive may be a great weakness in the whole body of proof. But it is not fatal to the prosecution case. When motive cannot be established the other evidence has to be scrutinised and examined closely.[34] The failure of the prosecution to establish the motive for the crime committed by the accused does not mean that the entire prosecution case has to be thrown over-board. It only casts a duty on the court to scrutinise the other evidence, particularly of the eye-witnesses, with greater care.[35] When the prosecution fails to prove motive, it cannot be a ground to throw the prosecution case over board, if other evidence proves the guilt of the accused beyond all reasonable doubt.[36] Failure to prove motive is not fatal to prove prosecution case as it is not a decisive test to determine criminal character of human acts.[37] The helplessness of the Investigating Officer in collecting evidence of neighbours regarding motive is not an insurance that the accused was innocent.[38]

In a case under Section 161, I.P.C., no motive could be proved for the receipt of illegal gratification by the accused. His acquittal was upheld.[39]

Proof of alleged motive for the crime is admissible though it suggests another crime by the accused.[40]

8. PROOF OF MOTIVE

Motive if put forward has to be fully established like any other incriminating circumstance.[41] Motive cannot be established by hearsay evidence, however reliable it appears to be.[42]

The motives of parties can only be ascertained by inference drawn from facts. Where A was tried for the murder of B, the facts that, at the instigation of A, B murdered C long before B's murder, and that at about that time, A used expressions of malice against C were held to be relevant as furnishing motive on the part of A who murdered B.[43] Motive may be inferred from past enmity.[44]

Where the deceased was doing pairavi in the revenue and criminal cases regarding the lands in question inherited by him but having been got recorded by the accused in their names, they were held to have strong motive in assaulting him.[45] Where the material produced showed that there were monetary transactions between the accused and the deceased and some account was to be settled, it was held to be sufficient to point out that there was some mental element to cause murder.[46]

Where the deceased, after taking advance, had cancelled the agreement to sell land in favour of the accused and returned the advanced money to the accused who had accepted the same which fact was admitted by the prosecution witness, the cancellation of the transaction no longer remained a grievance against the deceased and could not be taken as a motive with the accused to commit the murder of the deceased.[47] Where the brother of the deceased had supplied information regarding the illicit liquor business of the accused 3-4 years before the incident, motive was held to be highly improbable.[48]

9. WHEN MOTIVE BECOMES IMPORTANT

Facts which supply a motive for a particular act, such as the impending discovery by the deceased that the man accused of his murder had procured loans from him by means of forged documents,[49] or the impecuniosity of an alleged forger[50] are among the items of circumstantial evidence which are most often admitted.[51] Conversely, facts which tend to show a total absence of motive may be adduced, as where the lack of pecuniary embarrassment on his part is proved by someone accused of arson with intent to defraud an insurance company.[52]

It is, however, easy to attach too much weight to evidence of motive : 'Almost every child has something to gain by the death of his parents, but rarely on the death of a parent is patricide ever suspected.'[53]

Where the prosecution case depends on circumstantial evidence, motive assumes importance and goes a long way to prove the case of the prosecution.[54] Question of motive is of great importance in the case of circumstantial evidence, and where there is absence of such motive, the Court should carefully examine the absence of motive as a circumstance in favour of the accused. However, if the court is satisfied that the circumstances are such that they can lead only to one conclusion that the accused is guilty, then the absence of motive does not vitiate the conviction.[55] In case where only circumstantial evidence is available, at the outset, one considers the motive and the opportunity to commit the crime. If the evidence shows that the accused, having a strong motive, had the opportunity to commit the crime, and the established circumstances on record, considered along with the explanation, if any of the accused, exclude the reasonable possibility of anyone else being the real culprit, then the chain of evidence can be considered to be so complete as to hold the accused guilty in such a case.[56]

Motive is relevant in all criminal cases whether based on the testimony of the eye-witness or circumstantial evidence. In the instant case, the deceased father had rejected the demand of partition of the landed property made by the accused son who himself had said about the motive of rejection of his demand which was confirmed by his sister. So it could not be said that the motive factor had weakened the prosecution case.[57]

10. MOTIVE BY ITSELF NOT AN INCRIMINATING CIRCUMSTANCE

Mere existence of motive by itself is not an incriminating circumstance[58] and it cannot give rise to an inference of guilt.[59]

Motive for the crime, however adequate, cannot by itself sustain a criminal charge; and, conversely, if the evidence against the accused is clear and clinching, failure on the part of the prosecution to establish any motive is of no consequence.[60] The existence of a strong motive is often an enlightening factor in the process of presumptive reasoning. In estimating the probabilities of a case, motive cannot be left out of account. Though proof of motive is not essential, it is a material consideration.[61] Where an eyewitness stated that the accused told him that the victim was the person who took away the machine without paying repair charges, and then, the accused assaulted the victim and that he received an injury when he intervened, it was held that motive can be inferred.[62]

In the case of murder of the wife, there are many considerations which have to be looked into and it is difficult to know the exact motive in a given case.[63] The fact that, on two previous occasions, the accused was convicted for the offence of murder cannot constitute a motive or preparation for the offence of murder for which he is being tried, so as to attract Section 8.[64]

Previous threats, previous altercations, or previous litigations between parties are relevant to show motive.[65] It has been held that old enemity coupled with an incident regarding the passage of sullage water could be the motive for the crime.[66] Where the father gave the land standing in his name, to the accused, and subsequently got it mutated in the name of the brother of the accused, it was held that there was motive to kill the father.[67]

However where complaints were lodged against each other by the accused and the deceased, two years prior to the offence in question, it was held that they cannot prove the motive of the accused to commit the offence in question.[68]

Existence of previous and subsequent similar conduct is relevant to an issue of intention or other state of mind, although it cannot be used to prove the commission of the crime.[69]

If there is motive in doing an act, then the adequacy of that motive is not in all cases relevant. Heinous offences have been committed with a very slight motive.[70]

Motive or malice in prosecution cannot absolve the criminal though, if it is established, it may have its effect in the appreciation of evidence.[71]

Mere suspicion of motive is not sufficient to frame charges against an accused.[72]

11. PREPARATION AND ATTEMPT

Facts, such as the purchase of poison by someone who is accused of murder,[73] which suggest the existence of a plan or design, or preparation for a given course of action may always be proved, and this evidence is of considerable weight because it calls for an explanation of his conduct from the person against whom it is given.

Every offence consists of four stages namely: (1) Intention, (2) Preparation, (3) Attempt, (4) A completed act.

Under the Indian Penal Code only the third and fourth stages are punishable. The first and second stages are not punishable because the law allows locus penitentiae only upto the second stage. An attempt is a direct movement towards the commission, after preparation. There is greater degree of determination in an attempt as compared with preparation.[74]

Though preparation may not be an offence, still any fact which shows preparation is relevant under this section.

According to Stephen, an attempt is an act done with intent to commit a crime, and forming part of a series of acts which could constitute its actual commission, if it were not interrupted.[75]

Preparation consists[76] in devising or arranging means necessary for the commission of the offence. Preparations on the part of the accused to accomplish the crime charged, or to prevent its discovery, or to aid his escape, or to avert suspicion from himself are relevant on the question of his guilt. Where the question is whether A has committed an offence, the fact of his having procured the instruments, which are used in its commission, is relevant. Illustrations (c) and (d) refer to preparation.

If any act is done towards the commission of an offence but it does not lead to the commission of the offence, unless it is followed or preceded by other acts, then it is only an act of preparation.[77] In some cases, the person who wants to commit the crime, after making preparations, may have a second thought, to resile from his attempt. It becomes therefore, important to consider whether there was locus penitentiae.[78] No inference of guilt will arise where the preparations may have been innocent, or for the execution of something different, though illegal; or where the crime for the execution of which the preparations were made may have been subsequently frustrated or voluntarily abandoned. A is indicated for murdering B by poisoning him. It appears that, shortly before, A purchased a quantity of poison. This raises an inference of guilt. But it appears that A had purchased the poison to kill vermin. This overthrows the inference of guilt. A prepares poison with which he intends to kill B. Before he uses it he repents of his crime and abandons the idea of killing B. This overthrows the inference arising from the purchase of poison.

It is observed by Best: "Of all species of preparations, those which are resorted to for the purpose of averting suspicion from the criminal require the most particular notice..... Previous attempts to commit an offence are closely allied to preparations for the commission of it, and only differ in being carried one step further and nearer to the criminal act, of which, however, like the former, they fall short." (8th Ed. Section 454, 455, p. 403).

Mere writing of bogus telegrams with a view to despatch them for purposes of cheating would amount only to preparation.[79] An attempt is the direct movement towards the commission after preparations are made.[80] When a person wanted to administer something capable of causing miscarriage to a pregnant woman and, in fact, he administered a harmless substance, it was held that he cannot be convicted for an attempt to cause miscarriage in as much as the act he did was not an 'act done towards the commission of the offence' within the meaning of this section.[81] Attempt to commit an offence can be said to have come into being when the preparation is complete, and the culprit begins to do something within an intention of committing the offence, which is a step forward towards the commission of an offence, the moment he begins to do an act with the necessary intention, he commences his attempt to commit the offence.[82] An attempt is an act of such a nature that it is in itself evidence of a criminal intent with which it is done. A criminal attempt bears criminal intent upon its face.[83]

Where a debtor took the promisory note executed by him for purpose of endorsing the payment towards the debt and endorsed on it as if he paid the entire amount though he paid a small amount towards the debt, it was held that it was not mere prepration but an attempt to cheat.[84]

A person 'commits the offence' or 'attempts to commit a particular offence' when (i) he intends to commit that particular offence and (ii) he, having made preparations and with the intention to commit the offence does an act towards the commission. Such an act need not be the penultimate act towards the commission of that offence, but must be an act during the course of committing that offence.[85]

The distinction between preparation and attempt may be clear in some cases, but in most of the cases the dividing line is very thin; nonetheless, it is a real distinction. The crucial test is whether the last act, if not prevented by any extraneous cause would fructify into the commission of an offence; in such a case, it would amount to an attempt to commit an offence. The question is really one of fact depending upon the circumstances of each case.[86]

For more cases on preparation, attempt etc., standard commentaries on the Indian Penal Code and on Criminal Law may be referred to.

12. CONDUCT—MEANING OF

The expression 'conduct' is not defined in the Act. However this section also, by way of explanation, states what the expression 'conduct' would mean. The first explanation shows that mere statements as distinguished from the act would not constitute 'conduct' unless those statements accompany and explain the acts other than statements. It may be noted that statements which accompany the acts are part of res gestae and so they are relevant.[87]

The conduct of any party or his agent with reference to a suit or proceeding will be scanned under this section. A fact can be proved by conduct of a party and by surrounding circumstances. The production of articles by an accused person is relevant as evidence of conduct. Statements accompanying or explaining conduct are also relevant as part of the conduct itself. 'Conduct' to be relevant must directly influence or be influenced by a fact in issue or relevant fact. It would not include actions resulting from some other intermediary cause or circumstances.[88]

Thus, signs made by the deceased, shortly before her death, when questioned as to the circumstances under which injuries had been inflicted on her, could not be proved as conduct, as, taken alone, and without referring to questions leading to them, there was nothing to connect them with the cause of death and so to make them relevant.[89] Such questions and signs taken together are admissible in evidence under Section 32(1) as 'verbal statements' as to the cause of the death of the deceased. (Ibid).

13. PARTY

The word 'any party' in the main body of the section includes not only the plaintiff and defendant in a civil suit but also a person charged with an offence in a criminal prosecution. In criminal proceedings, the prosecution represented by the State occupies the position analogous to that of a plaintiff in a civil suit.[1]

The conduct of a party alone is admissible and of none others; the conduct of a conspirator who was dead and hence not an accused at the trial, is not admissible.[2] Where the joint act of several persons is sought to be proved, for an inference to be drawn from their conduct by the Court, it was held that evidence should be led with some degree of probability, so that it may be possible for the Court to draw necessary inference from the conduct of each one of the persons concerned in the Act.[3]

The conduct of an accused is relevant only against him and not against the co-accused.[4] Conduct of the prosecutrix, the victim of rape, that she informed her parents about the occurrence immediately, was relevant.[5] Where the accused led the police to the room of the co-accused from where the prosecutrix was found, such evidence is admissible.[6]

14. CONDUCT OF AN ACCUSED

There is distinction between the conduct of an accused, simpliciter, admissible under this section, and the conduct which is in reference to any fact in issue or relevant fact.

When the accused produces some articles which are the subject matter of the offence, it is relevant as evidence of conduct. Statements accompanying or explaining such conduct are also admissible under Section 8 as a part of his conduct.[7] Pointing of the accused to the police to the place where the dead body of his wife was hidden, would be admissible as conduct.[8] Where the accused after committing murder of his two daughters tried to commit suicide, his conduct was incriminating and admissible.[9] The fact that the person, accused of murder, appeared at the police station with the weapon of offence shortly after occurrence and blood-stained clothes were recovered from him, is admissible against the accused as the evidence of his conduct.[10]

15. SECTION 8 AND SECTION 27, SECTION 8 AND SECTION 162, Cr.P.C.

Where the accused led the police and pointed out the place where stolen articles or weapons, which might have been used in the commission of the offence, and they were found hidden, it was held that the conduct of the accused is admissible under this section, irrespective of the fact whether any statement by the accused contemporaneously with or antecedent to such conduct falls within the purview of Section 27 of the Act.[11] Where an accused led the police and the Panchas to a dealer from whom he purchased the weapon, it was held that the information given is inadmissible under Section 27, but the evidence given by the police officer and the Panchas, that the accused had taken them to the dealer, when corroborated by the dealer, is admissible under this section.[12]

In a case where the accused took out the weapon from a place under the cot and handed it over to the police without making any statement, that place being also accessible to all, it was held that the fact of recovery is barred under Section 27. It cannot also be relied upon as evidence under Section 8.[13] Where the accused pointed out the place where the stolen property was kept concealed, in the absence of anything to show that the property was stolen property, it was held that his conduct was not influenced by any fact in issue or relevant fact.[14]

The statement of an accused made to a police officer in the course of investigation, is hit by Section 162, Cr.P.C. What is excluded by Section 162, Cr.P.C., is the statement, and not the evidence relating to the conduct when questioned by the police officer. The conduct of the accused is not dealt with by Section 27, but is only relevant under this section.[15]

There is a distinction between the conduct of a person accused of an offence and a statement given to a police officer during investigation. The former is relevant under Section 8 and the latter will be hit by Section 162, Cr.P.C. Where an accused simply led the police and pointed out the place where incriminating articles were hidden and found, it is admissible as conduct under Section 8, irrespective of whether any statement given contemporaneously or antecedent to such conduct falls within the purview of Section 27.[16]

16. "CONDUCT OF ANY PERSON AN OFFENCE AGAINST WHOM IS THE SUBJECT OF ANY PROCEEDING"

Certain gestures of the deceased shortly before his death, in reply to the questions put to him are relevant as conduct under this section.[17] Where the deceased complained that he was apprehending danger to his life at the hands of certain people, such complaint is admissible as evidence of his conduct, in the trial wherein his death was the subject matter.[18]

Conduct may be antecedent, contemporaneous or subsequent conduct.

17. CONDUCT OF EYE-WITNESSES

The post-event conduct of a witness varies from person to person. It cannot be a cast-iron reaction to be followed as a model by everyone witnessing such event[19] and unless the reaction demonstrated by an eye-witness is so improbable or so inconceivable from any human being pitted in such a situation, it is unfair to dub his reaction as unnatural.[20]

Where the eye-witnesses, the brothers of the deceased arriving on the murder spot hearing his cries, ran away from there to inform the people leaving his brother in distress, their conduct was held to be unnatural and their presence there was doubtful.[21] The conduct of the eye-witness of the murder of her mother in not disclosing it to anybody and going to sleep quietly was held to be unnatural[22] but the conduct of the eye-witness, the body-guard of the victim of murderous assault in not retaliating the assault, was held to be not unnatural as the assault by fire arms by the assailants was sudden and there was no evidence to show that the body-guard was having any arms.[23]

18. ANTECEDENT CONDUCT

Under this category the previous attempts for committing the offence and also preparations would also become relevant. (See discussion under the head 'previous attempts').

Purchasing fire arms or a weapon of offence comes under antecedent conduct. It may be noted that motive for committing the offence, the means and opportunities of committing it, declarations of intention, and threats and previous attempts, and preparations, would all come under this head antecedent conduct.

In a trial for the offence of cheating, the facts that the accused was financially embarrassed and had attempted to cheat on other occasions were held to be relevant to prove motive under this section.[24] Some months before he was murdered, the deceased wrote a letter to the Commissioner of Police, Bombay, asking for protection and stating that he apprehended injury from accused No. 2 and was in fear of his life. At the trial of accused No. 2 for abetting the murder of the deceased by accused No. 1 the letter was offered in evidence for the prosecution. It was held that the letter was admissible in evidence as containing statements which accompanied and explained the conduct of the deceased, such conduct having been influenced by a fact in issue (viz., accused No. 2's alleged intention to caused deceased's death, Section 5, Ill. (a)), and a relevant fact (viz., accused No. 2's alleged ill-will towards deceased constituting a motive for accused No. 2's alleged complicity in the stabbing of the deceased).[25] At the trial of the accused for the murder of K, the approver gave evidence that he and the accused had murdered one B a few days before the murder of K, and that they proposed to conceal the murder of B by causing injuries to K and getting themselves arrested for so doing. It was held that the evidence was admissible to establish motive for the murder of K with which the accused were charged.[26]

19. CONTEMPORANEOUS CONDUCT

Evidence of contemporaneous conduct is always admissible as a surrounding circumstance.[27]

A contemporaneous tape-record of the conversation, provided it is proved, the voice is identified, and the accuracy of the conversation, eliminating the possibility of tampering, is established, is admissible as a relevant fact.[28] In the case of offence of bribery, immediate reactions, words or gestures or act at the time of the alleged offence are relevant.[29] Where a question is whether a document is a sale deed or a mortgage, contemporaneous conduct is always admissible.[30]

20. SUBSEQUENT CONDUCT

A criminal trial is not an enquiry into the conduct of an accused, for any purpose other than to determine whether he is guilty of the offence charged. In that connection, that piece of conduct of the accused can be held to be incriminatory which has no reasonable explanation except on the hypothesis that he is guilty. Conduct which destroys the presumption of innocence can alone be considered as material.[31]

Under the head subsequent conduct, the following types of conduct would be material:—

(1) Change of life, e.g., prior to an offence he is poor, subsequent to the offence he leads a posh life.

(2) Evasion of justice, e.g., absconding or hiding or fleeing the country, keeping things concealed or tampering with evidence, etc., all these afford a presumption of guilt according to the circumstances of the case.

(3) Fear, trembling, etc., physical symptoms indicating fear, paleness, trembling, fainting, weeping, sweating, sighing, hesitation, fluttering of the voice, etc.

There must be proper material showing the subsequent conduct of the accused to make it relevant and to add as an additional link for the main prosecution case.[32]

Refusal to appear in identification parade and to give specimen foot-prints is indicative of guilt.[33]

In a trial for kidnapping, robbery and murder, the subsequent conduct of the accused, in making evidence for himself to prove alibi, his projected flight by sea, and his endeavour to conceal his identity, were admitted in evidence as conduct indicating a consciousness of impending danger and guilt.[34] Where the accused saw the police he tried to escape which was the first sign of his guilty conduct and at his instance stolen property was recovered which was in his special knowledge, his conduct was relevant.[35] The conduct of an accused in absconding, when the police gets suspicious of his complicity in the offence of murder, is relevant under this section and might well be indicative to some extent of a guilty mind. But this is not the only conclusion to which it must lead the court. Such is the instinct of self-preservation in an average human being that even innocent persons may, when suspected of grave crimes, be tempted to evade arrest.[36] Evidence of possession by the accused of a large number of coins not in common circulation and his attempt to dispose of them were held to be admissible on his trial for having fraudulently delivered to another counterfeit coins knowing them to be counterfeit.[37]

Explaining the meaning of the term "absconder", the Supreme Court said: "To be absconder, in the eye of law, it is not necessary that a person should have run away from his home, it is sufficient if he hides himself, to evade the process of law even if the hiding place be in his own home."[38]

The conduct of the accused making himself scarce is relevant and may be indicative to some extent of a guilty mind, but would not be conclusive evidence of his guilt.[39] It was held in Matru v. State,[40] that mere absconding by itself does not necessarily lead to a firm conclusion of guilty mind; that the act is a relevant piece of evidence to be considered along with other evidence; that its value would depend on the circumstances of each case; and that it can scarcely be held as a determining link in completing the chain of circumstantial evidence, which must admit of no other hypothesis than that of the guilt of the accused.[41] In a case where B fired shots, R also was present but they both fled when villagers chased them. It was held that, from the mere presence of R at that place, it cannot be taken that he had common intention and his running away along with B cannot prove R's guilty conscience.[42]

The prosecution cannot satisfy itself by producing suspicious circumstances to show that the accused did not surrender or was not traceable for about a year.[43]

In Rahman v. State,[44] the Supreme Court observed: Different persons are differently constituted and some persons when wanted in a criminal case, deliberately abscond simply to avoid a criminal trial. Still, the flight of the accused from justice after the occurrence is a relevant circumstance indicative of the conduct of the accused. At the same time, it must be borne in mind that conclusion of guilty mind cannot be drawn from such circumstance alone because even an innocent person may be tempted to such conduct, to avoid arrest."

Where shortly after the rape, the victim makes a complaint to her mother, her complaint is her subsequent conduct having a direct bearing on the fact in issue and is admissible.[45] A statement of the prosecutrix, soon after the occurrence of rape, is admissible and relevant as the evidence of the prosecutrix in the court under Section 157.[46] Where a witness failed to identify the accused in a prior identification parade but identified in a subsequent parade, his subsequent conduct was held to be relevant to show that he was unreliable.[47]

Where the accused after committing murder of his wife gave information to the police that she had committed suicide and he thereby had given a version favourable to himself, such information (F.I.R.) is thus relevant under Section 8.[48] Where the accused of rape and strangulation tried to run away from the spot and on being caught begged forgiveness and pleaded that it was his first mistake, these facts form the subsequent conduct of the accused.[49] An accused stating that his wife had eloped with another man, without giving report to the police, went through an engagement ceremony post haste and also remained inactive inspite of the foul smell from his bathroom. On those facts it was held that subsequent conduct coupled with the motive was relevant as it proved his guilty mind.[50] In a case of murder taking place in the house of a witness, her conduct of sleeping in the neighbour's house, being a young wife of 28 years observing 'ghunghat' in the presence of her husband's elder brother, the accused, when her husband was away, was held to be not unnatural.[51] Though nothing was recovered from the vendor pointed out by the accused and from whom he had purchased the knife, the weapon of offence, his conduct could be relevant under Section 8.[52] Presence of the accused before and after the incident in the vicinity of the village in which dacoity took place is relevant and admissible under Section 8.[53] Where the accused was present at the spot where the dead body of the deceased was lying and he recognised it in the presence of other witnesses, his conduct of leading the police and other persons present at the spot to his house and pointed to the place from where the weapon of assault and other incriminating articles were recovered, was held to be admissible under this section.[54]

Minor deviations from regular conduct do not make the accused person insane or prove his unsoundness of mind.[55]

21. ABSCONDING OR FLEEING

The fact that the accused was seen with a pistol by the injured immediately after firing and the accused ran away from the spot is relevant.[56] Where the accused disappeared from his home after the incident of the killing, leaving his family including his wife and child in lurch and starting a new life in a far off village by converting himself as a sikh and concealing the real identity and raising a new family, all this destroyed the presumption of innocence and spoke volumes in favour of his guilt and his conduct was relevant under Section 8 and his conviction was proper.[57] In a robbery-cum-murder case the subsequent conduct of the accused in not absconding after the occurrence may be because they thought that they had obliterated evidence against them by killing all the three persons present in the house and they did not consider it wise to abscond, lest it might give rise to suspicion against them.[58]

22. FIRST INFORMATION REPORT

When the accused himself gives information which forms the first information report, it is admissible as his conduct under Section 8.[59]

The importance of first information report lies in the fact that it shows on what materials the investigation commenced and what was the story then told.[60]

If that information is a non-confessional statement it would be admissible under Section 21, as it is relevant as an admission.[61]

If it is a confessional statement made to a police officer it cannot be used under Section 25, but can be used under Section 27, to the extent allowed by that section.

However, that can be used only by way of corroboration or contradiction in view of Sections 145 and 157 of this Act.[62]

The first information report of an injured person can be admitted under illuss. (j) and (k) under this section.[63]

23. STATEMENT AND COMPLAINT

One must bear in mind the distinction between a statement and a complaint. Illuss., (j) and (k) of this section would show that the statements of a person against whom an offence is committed would be relevant. The distinction is that in the case of a statement, it is only a bare statement of fact, whereas a complaint is a statement made to a person in authority with a view to obtaining redress or punishment, e.g., to a police officer or a parent or some other person who is required for assistance and protection.[64]

According to PHIPSON: "the complaint must be voluntary and spontaneous and not elicited by leading, inducing or intimidating questions."[65]

A complaint was made to a Sub-divisional Officer by a person apprehending danger to his life, liberty and reputation. In the trial for conspiracy to murder the complainant, it was held that the complaint is admissible under this section, as evidence of conduct of the deceased which was being influenced by fear.[66] Where a raped girl of 4 years was crying and she disclosed the name of the accused and blood and semen were found on the clothes of the accused, it was held that the statement of the girl was admissible.[67] When a ravished woman lodges a complaint, the statements in the complaint are relevant as conduct, though they are not relevant as direct proof of the act. The facts in the complaint which relate to the charge against the accused may be given in evidence, not as being evidence of facts complained of, but as evidence of the consistency of conduct of the woman, and of the story given by her in the witness box, as negativing consent on her part.[68]

When a raped girl answers the questions put to her, her statement cannot be treated as a complaint.[69]

24. IMMEDIATE COMPLAINTS [ILLUSTRATIONS (J) AND (K)]

Under these illustrations the terms of the immediate complaint (not the formal complaint to Magistrate or Police Officer) are admissible as original evidence.[70]

Statements are admissible:—

(a) If they form part of the same transaction u/s. 6;

(b) Showing conduct influenced by a fact in issue u/s. 8;

(c) Negativing the consent when consent is material under Section 9;

(d) Other statements can be used under Sections 32, 145 and 157.

If the statement is made to a Police Officer during investigation, it is hit by Section 162, Cr. P.C.

Statement or disclosure made by a ravished girl either to the members of her family or to others, is an evidence of conduct, admissible as corroboration by Section 8, illustration (j).[71]

25. STATEMENTS NOT INCLUDED IN CONDUCT [EXPLANATION (1)]

This explanation, while explaining the word 'conduct' states "that the word 'conduct' does not include statements unless those statements accompany and explain acts other than statements." Thus, it is clear that the distinction is, on the one hand, between statement simpliciter and on the other statements which accompany and explain a certain act. A statement may consist of words spoken or written, or some gestures made by some mute persons. But acts exclude words and cannot be translated into words.[72]

This explanation points to a case in which a person whose conduct is in dispute mixes up actions and statements; and in such a case those actions and statements may be proved as a whole. For instance, a person is seen running down a street in a wounded condition, and calling out the names of his assailant, and the circumstances under which the injuries were inflicted. Here what the injured person says and what he does may be taken together and proved as a whole.[73]

Statements made by an accused while in the custody of the police are not admissible in evidence as conduct or otherwise.[74]

This section, so far as it admits a statement as included in the word 'conduct', must be read in connection with Sections 25 and 26, and cannot admit a statement as evidence which would be shut out by those sections.[75]

The evidence of police officers as to the pointing out of the various places by the accused cannot be treated as evidence of conduct because such evidence really amounts to confession of his guilt by the accused while he is in the custody of the police.[76] The evidence of circumstance that the accused led to the police officer and pointed out the place where the weapon which might have been used in the commission of offence was found hidden would be admissible as conduct, irrespective of the fact whether any statement by the accused contemporaneously with or antecedent to such conduct falls within the purview of Section 27.[77]

The Allahabad High Court had dissented from this view and held that the pointing out of property does not amount to a confession. The digging out and handing over to the police by the accused person, without saying anything, of certain articles from particular spots to which he took the police and witnesses does not amount to a "statement".[78]

In Bhagwandas v. State,[79] it was held that evidence relating to truth of a statement which does not explain any accompanying conduct of the accused is not admissible under this section. Hearsay evidence relating to a statement of admission by one of the conspirators is not admissible under this section, if it did not explain any accompanying conduct of that conspirator. When a person who took the bribe was caught, and gave a statement, the statement is not admissible.[80] Where a woman who was with her husband during the night, told her brother in the morning when questioned by them that she did not know the whereabouts of her husband, it was held that the statements of the brothers were inadmissible as they did not accompany or explain any act.[81]

Conversation over telephone for settling details for passing bribe-money was recorded by secret instruments. This was held to be evidence of conduct.[82]

The Court cited from R. v. Leatham, (1861-8 Cox CC 198): "It matters not how you get it, if you steal it even, it would be admissibl in evidence." If such statements do not appear on record, the evidence remains incomplete or imperfect.[83]

In State v. Hiraman,[84] witness stated that when she questioned a girl of 4 years of age, who was crying, she disclosed the name of the accused who raped her. "I saw her answering the calls of nature outside in the open and on seeing me she began crying and on questioning she told me that the accused had placed her on his lap and blood came out.". It was held that such part of the statement which explains the crying of the girl was admissible. Where the only eye-witness, the father of the victim girl who was fired at, did not mention the names of the accused to the neighbours who gathered there, after the occurrence, it was held that he might have not known the names of the accused and that does not render the prosecution case untrue specially where there was evidence against the accused.[85]

26. SILENCE OF THE ACCUSED [EXPLANATION (2)]

There is a difference of opinion as to whether silence of the accused is relevant and admissible, giving rise to an inference that he accepts the truth of the accusation where the charge is made by a police officer or other person with authority to investigate the crime.

This subject comes under Explanation 2, read with illus. (g), in the Act, which would show that a statement made to the accused or in his presence and hearing, which affects his conduct is admissible when such conduct is relevant. It is a general rule that statements in the presence of the accused, and which he might have contradicted, if untrue, are evidence against him. See illuss. (f) and (g).

The maxim qui taci consentire videtur (Silence gives consent) must be taken with considerable qualification. For silence to carry incriminating force, there must be circumstances which afford an opportunity to speak. Silence is not evidence of an admission, unless there are circumstances which render it more reasonably probable that a man would answer the charge made against him than that he would not.[86]

Before the words of a third person are let in, it must be shown that the conduct which they allege to affect is relevant.[87] In R. v. Christie[88], it was held that a statement made in the presence of the accused even when he should be expected reasonably to deny it, but does not do so, is not evidence against him of the facts stated. If he denies, the mere denial does not make it inadmissible because he may deny the statement in such a manner and in such circumstance as may lead a jury to disbelieve him and constitute evidence from which an acknowledgment may be inferred by them. This decision was considered in R. v. Hall[89], R. v. Chandler[90] and Parkes v. R[91]. There is an exhaustive discussion of the different views expressed in these decisions in 'PHIPSON ON EVIDENCE' 15th Edition (2000), paras 30-04 to 30-09, pages 736-743. After considering all these decisions it is observed at p. 409 as follows:

"LORD DIPLOCK made this comment: although in very exceptional circumstances an inference may be drawn from a failure to give an explanation or a disclaimer... silence alone, on being informed that an accusation has been made against him cannot give rise to an inference that (the defendant) accepts the truth of the accusation." In PHIPSON'S opinion this represents the correct modern view. Again PHIPSON states at page 740: "it is submitted that:

1. LORD DIPLOCK'S dictum in Hall is still the correct view of the law.
2. The circumstances of Parkes provide an exception to the rule which accords with common sense, and provides an example of an "exceptional circumstance" mentioned in the dictum of LORD DIPLOCK.
3. Accordingly, where an accusation is made when persons are speaking on even terms, silence in the face of an accusation may give rise to an inference that the defendant accepts the truth of the accusation.
4. As assistance in deciding what amounts to "even terms" Parkes is to be preferred to Chandler.

On the same footing, evidence may be strictly admissible, in circumstances where the matter is not within the party's knowledge[92] or the statements are not directly addressed to him[93] but the same principle as above will apply."

See also discussion on this aspect in CROSS ON EVIDENCE, 6th Edn., pp. 528-531 and CROSS & TAPPER ON EVIDENCE, 1995, 8th Edn., pp. 696-698; STEVE UGLOW'S EVIDENCE : TEXT & MATERIALS, 1997, pp. 122-123 and R. v. Cowan.[94]

Silence of the accused can be taken into account in proper cases, but no presumption arises ipso facto from the silence of the accused, as the accused has always a right to remain silent.[95] As the accused is not bound to give any explanation, mere silence cannot be used against him.[96]

The silence of the accused should come under Illus. (b) i.e., it should be proved that the accusation made by the woman against the man was made in his presence, when it becomes relevant.[97] Where an injured person told a third party in the presence of the accused that he was assaulted by the accused and the accused did not deny the accusation, the statement was held to be admissible under this section, because it afforded the accused an opportunity either to deny or give some explanation, though he might not avail himself of that opportunity.[98] It was held that to treat silence as an incriminating force there must be circumstances which afford the accused an opportunity to speak.[99]

PHIPSON[1] states: "But when the circumstances are such that a reply cannot properly be expected, the party's silence will afford no inference of assent.[2] And statements addressed to a party when he is ignorant of the language,[3] asleep, intoxicated, deaf,[4] dying,[5] has for a proper purpose promised to keep silent,[6] or is attending divine service,[7] are inadmissible. So, statements made in a party's presence in the course of judicial proceedings are not generally receivable against him merely on the ground that he did not deny them, for the regularity of such proceedings prevents the free interposition allowed in ordinary intercourse.[8] Even here, however, cases may occur in which the refusal of a party to repel a charge made in a Court of justice,[9] or to cross-examine or contradict a witness,[10] or to reply to an affidavit,[11] may afford a strong presumption that the imputations made against him are correct. This proposition was recently considered by James MUNBY Q.C. sitting as a Deputy High Court Judge of the Chancery Division in Killick v. Pountney.[12] Here a series of letters from the plaintiff's solicitors, a statement of claim and affidavit evidence sent to the defendant over a period of years failed to elicit any response[13] to the accusation made in them that the defendant had used undue influence in order to persuade an elderly man to make a new will to his significant advantage.[14] The defendant did not participate in the trial in any way. The learned judge was not persuaded by the authorities cited in Phipson[15] that he should draw an adverse inference from the defendant's silence and the Court of Appeal decision in Hollis v. Burton[16] was influential in persuading him that the facts of the case fell outside the ambit of any implied admission doctrine. He concluded that drawing the adverse inference proposed by counsel sat uncomfortably with the gravity of the question of undue influence,[17] the inquisitorial nature of the proceedings,[18] and compliance with the procedural requirement that a trial be conducted in contentious probate actions notwithstanding defaults and failures on the part of the defence.[19] The defendant's

Failure to answer letters may be less significant since, as SCRUTTON L.J. observed in Thomas v. Jones, (1921) 1 KB 22, 43. "Lunatics write all sorts of letters to all manner of people, and if the receiver of a letter from a lunatic making a charge were bound to write at once and deny it, the time of judges, at any rate, would be fully taken up by answering the letters."

17. Adverse inferences have been drawn from the defendant's silence to help establish murder in Halford v. Brookes, (1991) 3 All ER 559 and Francisco v. Diedrick, The Times, April 3, 1998.
18. It could be argued that if the nature of the proceedings were a relevant concern, the fact that the inquisitorial model tends to allow the admission of more evidence than the adversarial, should encourage the Court to regard the defendant's silence as evidence of some relevance and weight in its quest to determine the validity of the disputed will.
19. Formerly Order 76, now CPR, Part 49 and practice direction. The plaintiff called a number of witnesses and had established the prima facie case which is a necessary prerequisite for the drawing of any adverse inference.

silence and decision not to participate in the proceedings may not have been for discreditable reasons, let alone to conceal guilt of undue influence, but it is respectfully submitted that despite the learned judge's reluctance to speculate, this was necessary in order to determine the strength of the inference. This question of strength of inference was considered by the House of Lords in R. v. I.R.C., ex p. Commbs & Co.[20] :

> "In our legal system generally, the silence of one party in the face of the other party's evidence may convert that evidence into proof in relation to matters which are, or are likely to be, within the knowledge of the silent party and about which that party could be expected to give evidence. Thus, depending on the circumstances, a prima facie case may become a strong or even an overwhelming case. But, if the silent party's failure to give evidence (or to give the necessary evidence) can be credibly explained, even if not entirely justified, the effect of his silence in favour of the other party, may either be reduced or nullified."

No such presumption arises when the accused makes no statement or no detailed reply in answer to the statutory question of the Magistrate before committal,[21] or when asked by the police to make a statement after being cautioned.[22] The caution tells him that he need not reply and the mere omission to deny a formal charge made by the police is not evidence from which an inference can be drawn unfavourable to the accused.[23] This is so whether or not a caution is given. The caution merely reminds the suspect of his right to say nothing. The fact that he was not so reminded is no ground for inferring that his silence was not in exercise of that right.[24] Where a person charged makes no answer at all or makes some observation which in itself is not in the nature of an explanation it is better that the judge at the trial should make no observation on it.[25] Similarly, failure to deny an allegation of adultery after caution has been held not to be evidence of the adultery alleged."[26]

Fabricating false evidence.

Antedating a document to support a plea of alibi.[27]

Having possession of stolen properties.[28]

Expressions of fear or disturbed state of mind.[29]

When the accused was confronted in a bribe case and when he was called upon to produce the money, hesitation, perspiring, trembling, and things like that are relevant.[30]

Making attempts to conceal one's identity.[31]

28. CIVIL CASES

Even in civil cases sometimes subsequent conduct is relevant. Where there was conversion of a Hindu to Buddhism it was held that evidence of subsequent conduct can be given to corroborate the fact of conversion.[34] When a person complained to some people immediately after the receipt of a document that he was defrauded by a certain person, it was held that statement is admissible to establish his conduct.[35] Conduct of the members of the family suggesting the existence of a family arrangement is admissible.[36] A statement by a retiring partner, made immediately after his retirement, refusing to continue to guarantee the firm's account with a bank, may be admissible to explain his conduct.[37]

In the case of documents the Court very often interpret them by evidence of the mode in which the property dealt with by them has been held and enjoyed. SUGDEN L.C., stated in a case: "Tell me what you have done under such a deed, and I will tell you what that deed means".[38]

But where there is no ambiguity in a document, the acting or the conduct of parties is not relevant.[39] Acts of parties cannot be allowed to affect the construction of written instruments if that construction be in itself unambiguous,[40] for otherwise, the conduct of the party is very important in the construction of documents.

Facts necessary to explain or introduce relevant facts.

S. 9. Facts necessary to explain or introduce a fact in issue or relevant fact, or which support or rebut an inference suggested by a fact in issue or relevant fact, or which establish the identity of any thing or person whose identity is relevant, or fix the time or place at which any fact in issue or relevant fact happened, or which show the relation of parties by whom any such fact was transacted, are relevant insofar as they are necessary for that purpose.

(a) The question is, whether a given document is the will of A.

The state of A's property and of his family at the date of the alleged will may be relevant facts.

(b) A sues B for a libel imputing disgraceful conduct to A; B affirms that the matter alleged to be libellous is true.

The position and relations of the parties at the time when the libel was published may be relevant facts as introductory to the facts in issue.

The particulars of a dispute between A and B about a matter unconnected with the alleged libel are irrelevant, though the fact that there was a dispute may be relevant if it affected the relations between A and B.

(c) A is accused of a crime.

The fact that, soon after the commission of the crime, A absconded from his house, is relevant under Section 8, as conduct subsequent to and affected by facts in issue.

The fact that, at the time when he left home he had sudden and urgent business at the place to which he went, is relevant, as tending to explain the fact that he left home suddenly.

The details of the business on which he left are not relevant, except in so far as they are necessary to show that the business was sudden and urgent.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

Section 7 deals with the admissibility of facts which are the occasion, cause, or effect of facts in issue. Section 8, similarly makes admissible facts showing motive or preparation for any fact in issue or relevant fact. This section makes admissible facts which are necessary to explain or introduce relevant facts, such as place, name, date, identity of parties, circumstances and relations of the parties.

Illustrations (a) and (b) are examples of introductory fact.

Illustrations (d) and (e) indicate that explanatory statements are admitted under this section irrespective of the fact whether the person against whom it is made heard it or was present when it was made. Under this section it is not necessary that the person against whom the statement is made should be present when it is made.

When we deal with a fact to establish the identity of any person, at times it may be necessary to expose parts of the body, in which case the question would arise whether a person suspected of an offence can be compelled to expose his body, and whether the right of the suspect under the Constitution would be violated. It was held by the Supreme Court, that exposing parts of the body for purpose of identification does not offend Article 20(3) of the Constitution.[1]

The accused has no right to disguise or to cover the marks on his face or body in such a way as to deny the prosecution witness an opportunity of seeing as much as is necessary for identification.[2] Where at the time of T I parade, the burn injuries received by the accused during the occurrence were covered by trousers and were not visible to witnesses, identification by the witnesses was held to be proper.[3]

"There are many incidents, which though not strictly constituting a fact in issue, may yet be relevant to it. Not only may the probability of an occurrence be tested by considering its attendant circumstances, but these incidents are often essential to elucidate its true character, to reveal the motive of the parties or to establish their connection with the fact."[4]

Illustrations (a), (b), (d) and (f) are examples of how the fact becomes relevant in explaining or introducing a fact in issue. Illus. (e), deals with the facts which support or rebut an inference, suggested by a fact in issue or a relevant fact. Illus. (c), and the last part of illus. (b) give instances to explain the phrase "insofar as they are necessary for that purposes"; the second clause of illus. (c), shows how an inference under Section 8 from the act of absconding can be rebutted by showing that the absconder left home suddenly on account of urgent business at another place.

The principle in this section is a second exception to the general rule that evidence of collateral facts is not usually receivable.

2. FACTS NECESSARY TO EXPLAIN ETC.

In a case of conspiracy to commit a dacoity, facts showing close and intimate association of the accused with the approver are admissible under this section.[5]

Where the police at Bombay was informed by Nyasaland police by a telegram that two bank drafts were stolen and it was feared that signatures would be forged and the drafts might be encashed in Bombay. The accused encashed one of the drafts in a French Bank in Bombay and later presented another draft at another Bank in Bombay. The Bank officials gave information to the police who arrested the accused. It was held that the telegram received by Bombay police, which was alleged to have been sent from Nyasaland police was relevant to explain the conduct of the clerk in the Bank and therefore admissible.[6]

Section 88 cannot be a bar to a telegram being considered along with the other evidence and can be admissible for purposes covered by this section.[7]

It has been held that evidence of visits of the accused to two places in Karachi was admissible as the visits were closely connected with cheating the customs authority at Karachi.[8] Though a person was not shown as an accused along with the main accused, it was held that the tearing of a stolen draft by a person on hearing the arrest of another conspirator is admissible to show the conduct of such person.[9] Where a statement was made by a brother of a woman who was kidnapped, stating that his sister announced the accused as one of the abductors, it was held that it was admissible as explaining the circumstances of the arrest of the accused and also for establishing the identity of the accused.[10] If a person absconds immediately after the crime, though his name does not find a place in the first information report, such conduct is admissible as it tends to explain his conduct furnishing a motive and is relevant under this section.[11] The absence of an entry in an account book is relevant to explain the conduct of the person who prepares it.[12] Where a child was crying, it attracted the attention of the neighbours and at that time the child's mother was murdered, it was held that the evidence of neighbours was admissible, though they had not seen the actual murder, as their evidence spoke not only of the nature of the child's cries but also as to what the child said, though the child's evidence was not admissible.[13]

Where the question was whether A wrote an anonymous letter to B, threatening him and requiring him to meet A at a particular place, at an appointed time, the fact that A went to the place at the time appointed would be conduct relevant under this section, and the fact that A had some other business to transact at that place and time would be relevant as tending to rebut the inference raised by his going to the place that he was the author of the letter.[14] Where certain entries were made on a slip of paper showing particulars of the cheques some of which were the subject matter of the case, the complainant gave the circumstances under which the slip was written. It was held that both the slip and the complainant's statement were admissible showing the conduct relating to the issue of misappropriation.[15] The contract and the correspondence between the parties would be relevant, when dealing with a criminal case for cheating, in regard to the very same transaction.[16] Where a copy of a letter written by an accused was found in his possession, which showed that he sent the original with objectionable writing, it was held that in a case for sedition, the copy of the letter found with the accused was relevant to show the intention of the accused, and that it was not necessary for the prosecution to prove that such a letter was actually sent by the accused, before the copy was admitted in evidence.[17] Statements made by an accused person on previous occasion which would support or rebut the theory of his guilt are admissible under this section.[18]

Sections 9 and 11 read with Section 21 of this Act would justify the Court in admitting all previous statements made by the accused relating to the question of his guilt, and it is immaterial whether the previous statement is made to a police officer or to a judicial officer or to a third party provided that the statement is relevant to the fact in issue.[19] Where prior to the dacoity, the accused was associated with the approver, and their object was to commit thefts and other offences, when the persons were charged with an offence relating to a particular dacoity, it was held that the fact of close association with the approver corroborates with the approver's statement, that a conspiracy existed, and is, therefore, admissible under this section and/or Section 11[20] Report of the Court of Enquiry under Rule 75 of the Indian Aircraft Rules is admissible to explain or introduce a fact in issue or relevant fact which supports or rebuts an inference suggested by a fact in issue or relevant fact.[21]

3. INSOFAR AS THEY ARE NECESSARY FOR THAT PURPOSE

It is only such of those facts as are necessary for the purpose of explaining etc., of the fact in issue or relevant facts are admissible. Beyond that necessity, facts cannot be made relevant.[22]

4. CIVIL CASES

In many cases on the civil side where the market value of a piece of land or building was in question, it was held that the evidence of value of similar property in the neighbourhood was admissible as relevant under this section.[23] Rental value of neighbouring premises can be admitted as relevant for determining the value of land or building under the Calcutta Municipal Act.[24]

As to the price paid for a piece of land or building, the buyer and seller are the best persons having personal knowledge and their evidence is substantive evidence. The recitals in a document can be taken as evidence if they are relevant as admissions, or under Section 32 of the Act.[25]

The absence of an entry in a book of account is a relevant fact under this section and also under Section 11 of the Act to prove that an alleged payment was not made.[26] Absence of an entry in the school admission register which has to be maintained by a public servant under educational rules and under the Municipalities Act, becomes relevant under this section or Section 11.[27]

5. IDENTIFICATION

(a) General Principles

"It is often important to establish the identity of a person who a witness testifies that he saw on a relevant occasion. Sometimes, the witness will testify that he had seen the person before, or even knew the person well, and therefore recognised the person observed on the relevant occasion. But if the witness did not recognise the person he might still testify that on some subsequent occasion he was able to identify a person as the person he had initially seen on the relevant occasion. This subsequent occasion may have been formal, such as an identification parade, or informal, for instance seeing the person in the street. In each situation the reliability of the evidence of identification will depend on the quality of the opportunity which the witness had to see the person on the original relevant occasion. Where the witness purports to have identified the person on a subsequent occasion the reliability of that evidence will also depend on the quality of the subsequent identification process. Thus, the reliability of visual identification evidence will be greater if, for instance, the witness saw the person on the relevant occasion in good light, from close-up, for a considerable length of time, and the reliability will be less if, for instance, he was drunk when he witnessed the incident, he had not seen the person he knew for a long time or felt under pressure when asked to point someone out on a subsequent occasion.

Experience has shown that even honest and convincing witnesses can make mistakes in identification."[28]

In assessing the evidence of identification it is neither possible nor desirable to lay down any hard and fast rules. Certain guiding principles can be stated. One such is the basic principle of criminal law that a fact or circumstance should be proved against the accused before it can be relied upon and used against him. The evidence of identification is as much subject to the definition of the word 'proved' in Section 3 and must satisfy the tests laid down by that section. The test excludes from its orbit blind faith of a true believer, because prudence and credibility do not go together.

Where the investigation inspires confidence and the witness was tested fairly before he picked out the suspect, the demands of prudence are satisfied and the court feeling reassured rejects the possibility of a coincidence, which becomes remote; but, where the investigation is tainted, the performance of the witness cannot be accepted at its face value, for the reasonable possibility of external aid being given to the witness cannot be eliminated.[29]

(b) Object of Identification

In all criminal cases, the two important points that are to be decided are whether the alleged offence was committed, and, if so, who committed the offence. Even in civil cases the question of identity may arise; e.g., in a case of adoption, the question may arise whether a particular person is the adopted son of a particular individual. The object of conducting the test identification parade of a person is the same as in the case of identification of things or articles. Here also the evidence of test identification is only a supporting evidence and not substantive evidence. It helps only to corroborate the evidence of the identification witnesses.[30]

Identification would serve, firstly, to satisfy the investigating authority, before sending the case for trial to the Court, that the person arrested, who was not previously known to the witness, was one of those who committed the crime; secondly, to satisfy the Court that the accused was the offender.[31]

The identification of property is to be done, to satisfy the Court that the particular property was the subject-matter of the crime and to furnish evidence to corroborate the testimony of the witness.[32]

(c) Identification of Person

One of the methods of establishing the identity of the accused is "test identification parade". Its evidence is received under this section. The idea of the parade is to test the veracity of the witness on the question of his capability of identifying, from several persons made to stand in a queue, an unknown person whom the witness had seen at the time of occurrence.[33]

Test identification is designed to furnish evidence to corroborate the evidence which the witness concerned tenders before the Court.[34] It is considered a safe rule of prudence to generally look for corroboration of the sworn testimony of witnesses in court as to the identity of the accused who are strangers to them, in the form of earlier identification proceedings.[35]

When the eye-witness cannot give the name of the offender but claims that he can identify the offender if he is shown to him, it is all the more necessary to hold a test identification. In such cases, holding identification parade will be in the interest of the accused and of the prosecution. It is also a workable way of testing the memory and veracity of the witnesses.[36] The plea of the accused that it was not possible for a rickshaw-puller to remember after many days that a particular load was transferred at their instance, was held to be not tenable in the peculiar circumstances of the case and also because of the psychological phenomenon that human memory is very often a conditioned characteristic and any special or peculiar lineament can create an impact on the human mind lasting for long, unlike routine events.[37] Similarly absence of identification parade was held to be fatal where in a rape case the name of one of the accused was not mentioned in the F.I.R. along with others.[38] Where the persons who committed mass rape on the victim were not known to her, the investigating agency should conduct the identification parade.[39]

Identification parades are held by the police, during their investigation, for the purpose of enabling the witnesses to identify the properties which are the subject matter of the offence, or to identify the persons who are concerned in the offences.[40] Test identification is meant for the purpose of helping the investigation with an assurance that their progress with the investigation into the offence is proceeding on right lines, though it does not constitute substantive evidence.[41]

The identification made by the witnesses at the parade itself has no independent value. The identity of the accused can be proved by circumstantial evidence also.[42] The record of test identification itself is not substantive evidence according to law, without proof of those facts recorded. It can be used either for corroboration or for contradiction.[43] The evidence at the trial of a witness who identified the accused or articles before the police is admissible by way of corroboration.[44]

If the witnesses fail to identify in the identification parade prior to the trial, it may even destroy the case made out by their evidence.[45] However, where in a motor accident case, the driver ran away immediately after the accident, failure of some of the passengers to identify him was held to be not fatal.[46]

When the witness fails to identify the accused in Court, though the accused was identified in the test identification, no conviction can be based on the test identification.[47] Where some of the prosecution witnesses failed to identify the accused in the identification parade, the accused were given benefit of doubt.[48] However where a witness who identified the accused in test identification failed to identify at trial after 20 years, but the trial court was highly impressed by the testimony of the witness, the court relied on the identification by such witness in the test identification parade.[49]

Conversely identification by a witness in court for the first time without being tested by a prior test identification is valueless.[50]

Failure to get test identification, is not necessarily fatal to the prosecution.[51]

(d) Identification of the victim's body

Where the dead bodies of the victims, the mother and her newly-born baby were recovered from a pit in a highly decomposed condition and beyond recognition and evidence of the victim's parents and other witnesses was corroborated from the articles found on the dead bodies and the serologist's report, it was held that in the circumstances of the case, the identification of the victims was established.[52] Where the dead body of the victim was identified by the sister and the nephew of the deceased, it was immaterial that the doctors had varying opinions about the age of the victim and circumcision.[53] Absence of identification of the dead bodies of the victims in not by itself fatal to the prosecution case.[54]

(e) Identification prior to T.I. Parade

Where the prosecutrix, the victim of rape, had allegedly identified the accused twice before the Army Officers prior to T.I. parade, but the officers were not examined in the Court, it was held that no credence could be given to such identification.[55]

(f) When test identification is not necessary

When the accused is arrested at the scene of occurrence, or is caught by the people and produced before the police, it is not necessary to hold identification, in the absence of a request from the accused.[56] In such cases, omission to hold identification or to produce one of witnesses would not have a bearing on the prosecution case.[57] Where all the witnesses knew the accused before the occurrence and could identify him but they did not know his name, holding of T.I. parade was not essential.[58] Where the incident of murder took place during the day and the F.I.R. was lodged within an hour of the incident mentioning the names of the accused, there was no possibility of erroneous identity or concoction of a false story, non-holding identification parade did not matter.[59] Where the witnesses who were close friends of the deceased had the opportunity of talking together with the accused for about 7-8 minutes when the accused entered the place of incident, evidence of identification of the accused at their trial by the said witnesses without the corroboration of the T.I. parade could be relied upon.[60] Where in a case of rash and negligent driving there was enough evidence to identify the accused as a driver of the vehicle at the time of accident and his identity was never in dispute, identification parade was not necessary.[61] Where the rickshaw puller witnessed the murder being committed in his rickshaw and he stated that he knew the accused and even otherwise he was in their company for about three hours, conviction could be based on his testimony without holding any test identification parade.[62] Conducting T.I. parade was of no consequence where the murder was committed in the hospital where the nurse, the ward boy and the patients admitted there had a lot of opportunity to observe the accused and they were supporting the prosecution case.[63] If an accused is identified by cogent and proper evidence by other witnesses who were examined before the Court, normally identification parades are not resorted to.[64]

(g) Difference between identification of person and property

Identification of a person means recognising the face of a stranger who was seen momentarily only at the time of the commission of the crime. Identification of property is usually the recognition of the property by its owner. The owner knows his/ her own articles and when he/she sees them, he/she picks them out. He/she is well acquainted with all the peculiarities of the articles. Even though, ostensibly, there may be no distinctive marks, an owner can very frequently be trusted to pick out his/ her own articles. There is some peculiarity in the article which is present in the sub-conscious mind of its owner and which he/she may not be able to describe. It is, therefore, idle to place the identification of the property on the same footing as the identification of an accused person.[65]

Money cannot be the subject of test identification.[66]

The evidence at the trial of a witness who identified the accused or incriminatory articles before the police is admissible in evidence by way of corroboration.[67]

Mere recovery of money from the accused, is not sufficient for conducting identification.[68]

(h) Precautions : Identification of Articles

It is important to ensure that the witness did not have any opportunity of seeing the articles after its recovery by the police and before the test identification is conducted by a magistrate.[69] Where the witness was also present at the time of recovery of the articles it was held that the identification was legally defective in law. Where the photo of the article is already published in the newspapers, its identification has no value and is unreliable.[70] It is necessary for the police to seal the article recovered immediately after its recovery; the seal should be intact till the article is produced before a magistrate for the purpose of identification. It is the magistrate who should open the seal, mix it up with similar articles and then place them for identification by the witness.[71] Where the property was not sealed at the time of recovery, no value can be attached to the test identification proceedings.[72]

Similar articles are to be mixed up with the articles to be identified. Substantial number of items which are similar to the property in question should be mixed up so as to avoid the possibility of identification by accident.[73] As a matter of prudence, the Court must insist on atleast two articles of distinctive appearance being mixed up for proof of identification, when the identification of an article of distinctive appearance is in question.[74] If there are prominent marks they are to be concealed.[75]

When there was no evidence that the articles to be mixed up have not been seen by the witnesses, it was held that the identification was not reliable.[76] When it is found that the close relations of the deceased had identified the articles as belonging to the deceased by virtue of having frequently seen and handled them, it would be unjust to reject their testimony on the ground that similar articles were not mixed up and that reasons for their identifying the articles were not given.[77] Things of daily use identified by witnesses can be relied upon even in the absence of special identification marks on them.[78] Where stolen ornaments, sarees were readily recognised in the Court itself by the lady to whom they belonged, the evidence was admitted because ladies have an uncanny sense of knowing their things though sarees of that kind may be openly available in the market.[79] The female kin of the deceased mother would be in a better position than the male kin to identify the jewellery or ornaments worn by the deceased.[80]

Where, at the instance of an accused charged with murder, arrows and bows were recovered from his house, when there was nothing to connect them with the offence, mere recovery was held to be not an incriminating circumstance against the accused.[81] Where an article of common use like a dhoti with blood stains (in a rape case) was said to have been recovered from the house of the accused, but there was no evidence that it belonged to the accused and was worn by him when he committed the offence, mere identification of the dhoti was held to be of no use, though it had distinctive blood marks.[82]

Identification of washerman's mark on the clothes found on the dead body, by the washerman before the Magistrate, is sufficient proof. In such a case no test identification is necessary.[83]

(i) Articles need not be identical

For purpose of identification, the requirement is that similar articles are to be mixed up; they need not be identical articles.[84]

(j) When Witness is not able to give reasons for his Identification

Where the articles has a distinguishing mark, it causes a sub-conscious impression by frequent use and observation, on the mind of the identifier. And that leads the witness to identify the same, though such articles are generally available. Under such circumstances, the identifier may not be able to formulate his reasons for the identification. Therefore, his evidence cannot be discredited on the ground that reasons for identification are not given by him.[85]

(k) Identification only in Court—Effect

Failure to hold an identification parade does not make evidence of identification before the Court inadmissible.[86] But where one of the eye witness stated in a general manner that all the four persons in the dock were culprits and the other one stated that all the culprits had partially covered their faces and failed to identify two of the accused persons, they could not be convicted on the basis of such identification in the Court in the absence of corroboration by way of T.I. parade which was not held.[87]

When the witness identifies the stolen property in court and the evidence is clear, cogent and beyond any reasonable doubt, the fact that no list of property was furnished to the court in the proper time, and no identification was held or the identification was defective, would not detract from the value of his evidence.[88] Where a lady witness identified the stolen property, namely, silk sarees and ornaments, at the trial, and where there was no test identification, it was held that the testimony of the witness was admissible. It was held by the Supreme Court, that it is a matter of common knowledge that ladies have an uncanny sense of identifying their own belongings, particularly the articles of personal use such as, sarees, ornaments etc. Identification of such articles at the trial without any prior identification is acceptable, and can be acted upon.[89]

But if the ornament is broken to pieces, they cannot identify it.[90]

Identification for the first time during trial is inherently of a very weak character which loses much of its value without prior test identification parade.[91] Identification for the first time in the Court cannot be relied upon in the absence of corroboration[92] but where the victim had plenty of time to recognise the accused while he removed the gold ornaments from her neck in broad daylight and she had given his description in the F.I.R., identification by her for the first time in the Court was not vitiated by non-conduct of T.I. parade.[1] Where there was strong possibility of the accused having been shown to the witnesses before the identification parade and the same was rejected, conviction on the basis of identification in the Court was not justified.[2] Where the accused was identified for the first time in the Court and there was no other evidence against him, no conviction could be based on such identification.[3] Where the accused were already arrested but no T.I. parade was held, their identification by the father and uncle of the deceased for the first time in the Court, was held to be not reliable.[4] Where in a case of rape no identification parade was held and the victim did not know the accused, identification of the accused by her in the Court after more than three years, was of no value and could not form the basis of conviction.[5]

It was held by the Apex Court that it cannot be held that in the absence of test identification parade, the evidence of eye-witnesses identifying the accused for the first time during trial would become inadmissible or totally useless. The credence of such evidence would always depend on the facts and circumstances of each case.[6]

(l) Identification of Person—Right of the accused to demand identification

There is no provision in the Criminal Procedure Code to enable the accused to demand test identification on the ground that none of the witnesses are known to him and that they had never seen him. It was, however, held by the Supreme Court, that once the accused makes an application, and it is turned down, the prosecution would run the risk of losing the case unless there is some other evidence for the prosecution.[7] When the accused asks for test identification, and the Court is satisfied that there is some force in the contention of the accused, it has ample power under Section 540, Cr.P.C. (S. 311 of New Code) to direct test identification.[8] At least as a rule of prudence, it should be allowed, when the accused asserts that he is unknown to the witness.[9] The accused may rely on the omission of test identification, but he has no right to demand it.[10] In some cases, the accused can demand test identification.[11] When the accused makes a challenge that the witnesses do not know him, an identification should be held, unless the prosecution shows, that the accused was known to the witnesses.[12] Where the accused demands holding an identification parade, it should be allowed as it would be possible to check the varacity of the eye-witness.[13] Though the accused cannot compel the prosecution to hold an identification during the investigation, normally, it is desirable that the parade should be held if so desired by the accused.[14] When the prosecution failed to conduct test identification on the request of the accused, the Court ordered that the same should be held.[15] When the request for identification of the accused who asserted that he was not known to the witnesses, was denied, it was held that the denial of the right of the accused would tantamount to stopping the accused from setting up a defence and was against the elementary principles of criminal law.[16]

In re.: Sangaiah, (1948 Mad 113), it was held: "Identification parades are held not for the purpose of giving defence advocates material to work on but in order to satisfy investigating officers of the bona fides of the prosecution witnesses."[17]

If there is failure to hold the identification, when the eye-witnesses name the accused as the murderer, without knowing the accused before the occurrence of the crime, evidence of the witness cannot safely be relied on.[18]

Where a witness gives the name of one accused whom he has identified, ordinarily no identification parade is necessary. But if any accused holds out a challenge, the accused should be put on a parade and such a parade must always be held in order to meet the challenge. One exception to this is that if the accused had been arrested on the spot and was in police custody up to the time of trial, there could be no question at all about his identity.[19]

It cannot be said that once the prayer of accused for putting him to identification by witnesses, who claim to be knowing the accused from before, is opposed by the prosecution and is not accepted, he becomes entitled to be released on bail irrespective of other facts of the case.[20]

(m) Identification under supervision of a Magistrate

Identification has to be done under the supervision of a Magistrate. There is a great responsibility on the part of the Magistrate to see that it is done with care and caution and according to the rules prescribed, because the life and liberty of the accused would depend on his vigilance and caution. He must also see that the identification is not conducted in such a way as to make it impossible for the identifiers, to identify the suspect.[21]

Test identification conducted by Magistrates is preferred to identification conducted by any other person. The Magistrate's identification memo is a record of his statement which the identifier expressly or impliedly made before him. The statement is a formal statement of the identifier and it is usable normally for contradicting him under Section 145 or Section 155 of this Act, and also for corroborating him under Section 157. If it was made before the police, it would be hit by Section 162 Cr.P.C., and would, therefore, not be admissible for purposes of corroboration.

If a I class or a II class Magistrate specially empowered holds identification, Section 164, Cr.P.C., applies and his identification memo is admissible in evidence under Section 80 without proof. If others hold identification, they must be called to prove their memo.[22]

The Magistrate must make sure that the witness is a stranger to the suspect; otherwise the whole identification becomes a farce.[23]

Under Para 443 of U.P., Jail Manual, an advocate has a right to be present. So, refusal by the Magistrate to admit the advocate during identification is a negation of the right granted to the accused by law.[24]

6. PRESENCE OF POLICE

Test identification should be done genuinely and properly. The main consideration for the Court should be whether the test identification was conducted in a fair and reasonable manner, as there is always a possibility of mistaken identification. Therefore, it becomes necessary to observe certain important precautions before conducting the test identification.

Where an identification parade is conducted by the police, the evidence of such identification either of the property or of the person is hit by the provisions of Section 162, Cr.P.C.[25] No police should be present in the vicinity where the parade is conducted and police should not be with the identifying witnesses even for sometime prior to the test identification.[26] When the police arranged for identification parade to be held by panchas, the statements made by the witnesses to the panchas would be outside Section 162, Cr.P.C. provided police have been kept away from the place of the parade; and the entire identification is conducted by the panchas themselves.[27] An identification parade held by investigating officer for his 'personal satisfaction' (in the absence of Magistrate) in a murder case involving several accused, is a grievous error of judgement on the part of the investigating officer.[28]

7. REFUSAL BY THE ACCUSED TO APPEAR FOR TEST IDENTIFICATION

When the accused refuses to appear for a test identification, an adverse inference of the guilt of the accused can be drawn.[29]

However, a contrary view was expressed in Adesh Kumar v. State.[30]

When an accused refused on the ground that he was already shown to the witness, his subsequent identification in Court has no probative value, and no adverse inference can be drawn against the accused[31] so also where the photos of the accused were shown to the witnesses[32] but where the accused had no evidence to substantiate his assertion of having been shown to witnesses in the police station, adverse inference could be drawn against him.[33]

Where the accused refused to participate in the identification, the evidence of the witness identifying the accused in the Court, can be relied upon.[34] Where ample opportunity existed for the eye-witnesses to identify the assailants, evidentiary value of their evidence would not be detracted by the accused not participating in the identification parade.[35]

8. LEGITIMACY OF T.I. PARADE (PLACE OF HOLDING)

Where the photographs of the accused were shown to the witnesses before the T.I. parade, the parade was held in the lock-up of the investigating agency thereby identifying witnesses got sufficient opportunity of seeing the accused, the identifying witnesses were police constables attached to the concerned police station; it was all the more necessary for the investigating agency to ensure that the T.I.

parade was held in a manner and at a place (preferably in jail) so as to avoid any criticism about its legitimacy.[36]

9. VALUE OF TEST IDENTIFICATION

The evidence of test identification is not substantive evidence, but can be used for corroboration or contradiction.[37] The value of identification is very poor and it would be very unsafe to rely on it solely for upholding the conviction.[38]

There cannot be any hard and fast rule for placing reliance on the evidence of identifying witness. Each case depends upon its facts.[39]

Where the witnesses identified the accused both in the test identification and in the Court, their evidence can safely be accepted.[40] Where the prosecution witness identified the accused as a dacoit in the T.I. parade conducted by the Magistrate but did not recognise him in the trial Court and trembled while accused stared at him which demeanour was noted by the Court, conviction was based on such substantive identification evidence.[41] The importance of identification of the accused by the witness in the Court cannot be minimised simply because he failed to identify the accused in the T.I. parade in the first round.[42]

The mere ipse dixit of the witness that the accused was one of the dacoits could not be believed in the absence of an identification parade.[43]

Where certain marks on the accused were not mentioned in the FIR, or identification, by any identifying witness, benefit of doubt should be given to the accused.[44] The witnesses identifying the accused at the first sight after the gap of seven weeks after arrest though his beard and long hairs which he had at the time of commission of offence were removed, delay not satisfactorily explained and possibility of having been shown, rendered the evidence of identification unacceptable and the accused was held to be entitled to benefit of doubt.[45]

No presumption can be drawn when the identifying witnesses are coached by police, or when suspects are shown to them.[46] Some facts to be borne in mind by the Court, with respect to identifying witnesses, to determine whether they are worthy of being relied on, are:—

(1) The number of wrong persons picked out by the identifying witnesses.

(2) The consistency of the identification made at different times.

(3) Sufficiency of number of men on parade.

The other facts which should weigh with the judge in scrutinising the identifying evidence are:—

(1) Whether the witness has known the accused.

Where the accused persons were know to the witnesses as they were residing in a village within a radius of two miles, no weightage could be given to their testimony of identification.[47]

(2) Whether the witnesses were close enough to the accused about the time of the alleged occurrence.

(3) Whether the accused had taken some prominent part which impressed the witnesses in making the identification.[48]

The Court should approach the evidence of identification with the reasonable doubt of an intelligent person and accept it only if his doubts are removed. The requirement is the satisfaction of the court on the acceptability of the identification. If the identification parade was not properly and regularly conducted, it cannot operate as reliable corroboration regarding identification in the Court.[49]

If precautions had not been taken by the Magistrate before and after the identification parade, the evidence in that respect must be excluded from consideration while judging the guilt of the appellants.[50] The fact that eye-witness identifying an accused in parade did not say anything with regard to the specific part played by the accused in the commission of the crime, does not render evidence of such identification inadmissible[51] and the testimony of an identification witness cannot be discarded on the alleged ground that he had not disclosed the features of the accused at the time of the T.I. parade.[52]

A witness should be judged by the Court on the strength of what he himself has seen and not on what he was told.[53]

Identification of a parade by witness for the first time in Court, without it being tested by a prior test identification parade is valueless.[54]

Evidence of identifying witness not examined in committing Court, can be accepted under Section 207A, Cr.P.C., 1898.[55]

Where a particular description of one of the accused was given, earlier, then such distinctive description might go a long way in supporting the identification of witnesses.[56]

When the possibility of the witness seeing the accused before the parade is not ruled out, the accused is to be given the benefit of doubt, more so where there was delay in holding the parade on account of transferring the accused from jail to jail for some reasons.[57]

It is the duty of the prosecution to establish beyond any doubt that the witnesses, who identify the accused at the identification parade had seen him at the time of occurrence, that they did not know him before, and did not see him at any time after the occurrence and prior to the identification parade.[58]

When accused is shown to victim by police before trial, his identification in court by victim is valueless.[59] When the identifying witnesses had no opportunity to see the accused persons prior to holding of the test identification parade, and such witnessed had identified the accused as culprits who committed dacoity, the conviction on the basis of such witnesses was held to be proper[60] and the mere fact that the witnesses and one of the accused used to board the same train everyday would not mean that they were known to each other.[61]

When the accused is known by his common name and not his original name, and the common name was mentioned in the FIR, it cannot be said that the accused was not known to the witnesses, and it is not necessary to hold identification.[62] If the accused was taken for recovery of alleged weapon of offence just before conducting the identification parade, the identification of the accused without any supporting evidence would not be a valid identification and cannot be made the basis for conviction.[63]

If the names and description of the accused are not given in FIR, and if the accused were identified only before the Court four months after the occurrence and that too, without holding test identification, such identification is not reliable[64] and where no description of the culprits was given by the witnesses during their examination by the police under Section 161, Cr.P.C. but they gave some description when examined just before the T.I. parade, that cannot be considered as a circumstance to strengthen the evidence of identification in the Court,[65] but if the witnesses identified the accused in the identification parade which was corroborated by the evidence of other witnesses, their evidence could not be disbelieved merely because the description of the accused was not given in the F.I.R.[66]

A witness taking 10 minutes to identify the accused cannot be relied on.[67]

If the identification appears to have been induced by any suggestion or other means, the Court should not hesitate to quash any conviction, particularly when the decision depended upon the identification of the accused.[68]

The jail identification by the witness had a positive value though the value is reduced by the fact of his non-identification at trial.[69]

Where there was enmity of witness towards the accused, the identification may not afford a plausible ground to believe the statements of the witness.[70]

Identification cannot be discarded because witness omits to give description during investigation but identifies subsequently.[71]

The witnesses must be questioned before identification on what basis they are going to identify the suspect and the statements of particulars given by them have to be recorded; if the witness did not give any distinctive features or marks of the accused, though he identified during the test identification, the identification would not have any value.[72]

However it was held that even where the witness had not given the details of the suspect, the lacuna does not vitiate the identification of the suspect by the witness.[73]

Where there was no possibility of villagers arriving at the scene of offence before the accused fled the scene, it was held that evidence of identification by villagers lost its significance.[74] Where there were material discrepancies in the dying declaration and the eye-witness account, regarding the identity of the assailant, the defence could show that the dying declaration belied the evidence the eye-witness.[75]

In a dacoity case, the inmates of the house where the dacoity was committed are competent witnesses to depose on the point of identification of the accused persons by them. Their testimony cannot be discarded as that of interested witnesses.[76]

Evidence of witnesses as to the identification of a large number of dacoits cannot be accepted without corroboration.[77]

Evidence of witnesses who could identify two out of three accused in the dacoity, cannot be rejected merely because, by some mistake, one accused could not be identified.[78]

Where the police official failed to mention certain steps taken by him in the memo, that by itself did not invalidate the identification in the absence its direct bearing on the identification.[79]

10. PROOF OF IDENTIFICATION

"PHIPSON[80] states : Most commonly a witness will testify to his own identification of the person, either as a matter of recognition at the time of the incident or as a matter of identification on a subsequent occasion. Sometimes a witness will be unable to testify that he recognised the person as someone known by a particular name because his only knowledge that the person was known by that name was derived from what he had been told by someone else and the evidence would consequently be hearsay.[81]

Sometimes, it may be desirable for another witness to give evidence of the identification, for instance, because the identifier has forgotten or is unavailable. There is some doubt, however, as to whether such evidence is hearsay.

It is sometimes suggested that identification is an act and as such is not covered by the hearsay rule. Any statement accompanying the act, such as "that is the man" or "it is number eight", can then be admitted as part of the act,[82] or so mixed up with it as to become part of the res gestae.[83] But, with respect, there seems little justification for treating an act which was intended by the actor to be equivalent of an oral assertion, such as pointing out one person on an identification parade, as outside the scope of the hearsay rule.

82. This was conceded by counsel for the respondent before the House of Lords in R. v. Christie, (1914) AC 545, and their Lordships then divided on whether the recital of the indecent assault by the child at the time of identification was also part of the act of identification; Lord ATKINSON, with whom Lord PARKER concurred holding that it was, at pp. 553-554, VISCOUNT HALDANE (at p. 551), Lord MOULTON (at p. 558) and Lord READING (at p. 563) holding that it was not. Only VISCOUNT HALDANE and Lord MOULTON, however, seem to have doubted the concession.

It is sometimes suggested as an alternative that there is a general exception to the hearsay rule for identification evidence.[84] This suggestion seems to be contradicted, however, both by the authority of Lord MORRIS, who stated in Sparks v. R.[85] that "there is no rule which permits the giving of hearsay evidence merely because it relates to identity", and by the fact that it is clear that excited utterances of identification have to fall within the scope of that aspect of the res gestae exception to the hearsay rule in order to be admissible. It has been said, however, that there is statutory authority for admitting hearsay evidence of formal identifications complying with Code of Practice D.[86] But, with respect to the Court of Appeal, the argument that Parliament by passing Section 67(10) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act, 1984 intended to delegate to the Secretary of State, subject to approval by resolution, the power to create exceptions to the hearsay rule, is far-fetched. If this argument is accepted, however, it has the merit of only allowing the admission of hearsay evidence where the identification had been subject to the safeguards as to reliability contained in the Codes of Practice.

It is submitted that the correct view is that it would contravene the hearsay rule for someone other than the identifying witness to testify to the identification. Where the identifying witness is unavailable, however, such evidence may be admitted under one of the statutory exceptions to the hearsay rule found in Sections 23 and 24 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1988. The Court of Appeal has indicated that in deciding the fairness of admitting such hearsay evidence of identification[87] the trial judge should consider the strength of the evidence of identification and the possibility of it being controverted otherwise than by cross-examination.[88]"

Where the identification memorandum was not proved by any of the identification witnesses or by the Magistrate, the identification evidence cannot be relied upon.[89]

11. CONVICTION ON THE BASIS OF T.I. PARADE

Conviction can be based on the evidence of T.I. parade alone only when the Court concludes that the testimony of identification witnesses was beyond suspicion.[90] Where Clause XI of the Criminal Manual was substantially complied with and no serious defect could be pointed out in the identification parade and the accused were properly identified, conviction could be based on such identification.[91] Where delay in conducting T.I. parade was explained and there was no possibility of the accused having been shown to the witness whose evidence of identification was found to be reliable, conviction could be based on such evidence.[92] It is not a hard and fast rule that conviction cannot be based on solitary identification. It is a rule of prudence where the incident took place at right and there was not sufficient light for identification, it would not be safe to sustain conviction on such identification.[93] In a case of dacoity, the accused were alleged to have looted firearms but no evidence was adduced to show that the accused was not shown to any witness from the time of his arrest till the time of his lodging at the jail. Besides, there was no recovery of any of the weapons looted in the present dacoity. Conviction only on the basis of identification by witness was not proper.[94] In a case the docoits looted a bus passengers at 11 p.m. The witnesses, the inmates of the bus, gave no description of the dacoits in their earlier statements and oral evidence in the Court. The accused were detained at the police station for two days after the occurrence without any explanation. Identification of the accused by the witnesses within any margin of error, created suspicion in the mind of the Court and conviction was set aside.[1] Where conviction was not based on identification parade but on the reliable evidence of the eye-witnesses, conviction could not be set aside on the ground that identification was not reliable as the witness had seen the accused prior to T.I. parade.[2]

84. Support for this is often said to be found in R. v. Osbourne and Virtue, (1973) QB 678 CA. But in that case the main issue was whether the identifying witness's account of the identification procedure could be contradicted by evidence from another prosecution witness, and the hearsay rule does not appear to have been expressly mentioned.

12. MIXING

To achieve the guarantee of truth, when several witnesses are to identify the suspect or suspects, each suspect should be separately put up for identification; the witnesses should be kept outside the purview of the suspect and each time only one identifier should be called; for every identifier there should be change of clothes of the suspect. The suspect should be given, the chance of any place in the row of non-suspects who are mixed up with him; he may be allowed to change the position in the row for the identification of each identifier.[3]

As to the proportion of other persons to be mixed up with the suspect, there cannot be any hard and fast rule; but, in some cases, it was held that the proportion should be atleast 3:1.[4]

The Allahabad High Court held that it should be 5:1. The Supreme Court, in Budhsen v. State, (AIR 1970 SC 1321) held that the number of undertrial prisoners or outsiders who are to be mixed-up with the suspect should be reasonably large and their bearing and general appearance should not be glaringly dissimilar.[5] Proportion of outsiders to be mixed up with suspects should be fair.[6] Where the accused was mixed up will the persons of the same age and the witness identified him after rounds, it was held that in the circumstances of the case, the identification evidence could not be discarded merely because the height of the accused was less than the persons with whom he was mixed up or he had a sear.[7]

An identification parade must be held in the Jail premises, because the undertrial prisoners will be available for mixing up, with the suspect during course of identification. And, secondly, the witnesses can be kept outside the compound of the jail so that they cannot see the suspect prior to the identification.[8]

13. OFFENCE AT NIGHT

Where the witness knew the accused prior to the occurrence and, when the offence took place during night, a lantern was burning, and the witness was sleeping, a few feet away from the accused, it was held that there was no difficulty for the witness to identify the accused.[9]

Where there was a tiny kerosene lantern at the time of occurrence, it was held that it was inherently difficult for a person to identify a large number of 14 or 15 persons who committed the offence.[10] Where the minor girls were admittedly asleep during the alleged murder on the spot in pitch darkness of night and their version that their clothes smeared with blood of the deceased were confiscated by the

Investigating officer, was negatived by him, identification by then was held to be untrustworthy.[11] Where in a dacoity case one of the witnesses failed to identify the accused, there was darkness at the place of incident and the miscreants covering their faces were not known to the witnesses, it was held that in such circumstances identification was not possible[12] but in a dacoity case, the clothes on the face of the accused came down in the scuffle and the lights were on at the relevant time at night, identification of the accused by the witnesses in the T.I. parade was held to be reliable.[13]

But in a subsequent case, the Supreme Court observed that villagers living in villages where electricity has not reached as yet, get accustomed to seeing things in the light shed by a lantern, and that their eye-sight gets conditioned and becomes accustomed to the situation.[14]

It would not make identification of all accused in a double murder case impossible, when occurrence took place in an open field at 5.30 p.m., if the accused belonged to the same village.[15]

The evidence at the trial of a witness who identified the accused or incriminatory articles before the police is admissible in evidence by way of corroboration.[16]

When a witness testified regarding the identification of the accused in the test identification parade, and he had seen the accused during night time when the offence took place, it is necessary for the court to satisfy itself as to the condition of the eye-sight of the identifier. If it is found that his vision is dim and he is not in a position to recognise the person from a distance, it would become doubtful whether he was able to recognise the suspect in the darkness. The prevailing light at that time would be of crucial importance.[17]

A stabbing incident took place in moonlight; the assailant was near the victim and the victim's brother was also there. The assailant was known to the victim and his brother previously. On those facts it was held that it was possible for the victim and his brother to identify the accused in that moonlight.[18] Where the eye-witness deposed that he had seen the occurrence and identified the accused in moonlight from a particular distance, his evidence could not be defaulted on the presumptuous ground of improbability of identification from the particular distance.[19] Where the assailants could target their victims without mistake in the light then available, though meager, the same light was held to be sufficient for the injured victims to identify them.[20]

Where the witness and the accused who was his step-son, were living in the same house, it was held that it would be possible for the witness to recognise the accused, though the offence took place in the room and even though it was dark, as the witness physically intervened while the accused was striking the deceased, and the witness had the opportunity of feeling the presence of the accused by touch.[21]

Where the dacoits used battery lights and there was an electric light burning nearby, the evidence of eye-witnesses that they were able to identify them was accepted, though identification was held after a long time.[22] Where the prosecution witnesses got ample opportunity to identify the accused/dacoits as they spent considerable time in looting and ransacking the house and the witnesses were not put to mortal fear also, the delay in conducting the T.I. parade was explained, conviction on their identification evidence was held to be proper.[23]

Where the only evidence is of identification of dacoits, the question of light is of paramount importance. This should be appreciated in a careful and judicious manner.[24] It is the duty of the court to see (a) state of light at the time of dacoity or any offence; (b) condition of the eye-sight of the identifier; (c) state of his mind, (d) opportunity of seeing the offender; (e) errors committed by him in identification, (f) any special conduct or outstanding features of the offender noticed by him.[25]

14. DELAY IN IDENTIFICATION

The identification should be held as early as possible after the arrest of the accused; because the impression in the mind of the witness may fade in course of time. In the following cases, it was held that the identification was valueless on account of unreasonable delay. Whenever, there is delay in holding a test identification, the prosecution should explain it, and the absence of a reasonable explanation will detract from the value of the test.[26] Where the T.I. parade was held after about 3 or 4 months of arrest of the accused persons and no explanation was given for the inordinate delay, identification evidence of such T.I. parade was held to be unreliable.[27] Where the name of the accused was included after the identification parade which was conducted after the delay of seven months of which no plausible explanation was given and the independent witnesses disowned the participation of the accused, it could be said that he was falsely booked in the crime and his acquittal by giving him benefit of doubt was held to be proper.[28] Where the T.I. parade was held after 56 days and being the resident of a nearby village, there was possibility of his being seen by the witness, accused was entitled to acquittal. Delay casts doubt vis-a-vis it's genuineness.[29]

Where is a case of dacoity test identification parade was held after three and a half months of the occurrence but there was no material to show that the witnesses had the chance to see the suspect before the identification parade, it was held to be reliable.[30] Where in a case of dacoity involving murder of four members of the family in a gruesome and callous manner in electric light leaving deep impression of the culprits on the mind of the witnesses, the accused were put on test identification within 24 hours of their arrest, identification could not be rejected merely on the ground that it was not possible for them to identify the culprits after a period of three months from the incident.[31] Where the injured eye-witnesses in their examination and cross-examination showed that they had gained enduring impress of identity of the accused terrorists during the incident in which they had lost their near and dear ones, delayed identification by them of the accused in the Court after seven or eight years would not affect their evidence.[32] Where the witnesses had occasion to see the accused dacoits clearly and distinctly, the allegation of showing their photographs to witnesses is of no consequence and the fact of conducting T.I. parade 11 days after producing the accused before the Magistrate did not amount to delay.[33]

Identification becomes suspect if all witnesses identify the accused after a lapse of one year and not one of them makes a mistake.[34]

In the case of identification, where the accused was on bail for a considerable period, the omission to point out this circumstance to Jury is a serious misdirection.[35]

The delay becomes immaterial when the prosecution does not rely on the evidence of test identification.[36]

The validity of test identification cannot be challenged on the ground of irregularity in the manner of holding it or on the ground of undue delay, when the Magistrate who conducted the identification and the Police Officer who conducted the investigation have not been cross-examined in that behalf.[37]

15. FAILURE OF CONDUCT T.I. PARADE

The purpose of holding T.I. parade is to test the veracity of the witness on the question of identity. Non-holding of it would render unsafe the reliance on the evidence of such witness.[38] Opportunity to a witness to interact with the accused or to notice his distinctive features lends assurance to his testimony in the Court and absence of corroborative evidence by way of test identification parade would not be material.[39] Where the claim of the eye-witnesses that they already knew the accused was found to be true, failure to hold T.I. parade was inconsequential even if the accused demanded for the source.[40] Where the departmental witness whom the accused was unknown was uncorroborated by independent witnesses still no test identification was held, the accused was entitled to benefit of doubt.[41]

16. METHODS OF IDENTIFICATION

A witness may testify to a person's identity from his voice alone or from observing his stature, complexion, clothing, or other marks, or from the person's photograph. A witness may testify to a person's age or state of intoxication merely from his appearance; so, too, chattels, may be identified by their appearance and other qualities.[42]

42. WIGMORE, Vol. 2, Section 660, p. 771.

"In R. v. Deenik,[43] the Court of Appeal upheld a conviction following a trial where voice recognition evidence was admitted. The evidence was given by a Customs Officer who identified the voice of the defendant, who she overheard being interviewed, with the voice of a man she had spoken to on the telephone whilst masquerading as another suspect's wife. Although there is no Code of Practice governing voice recognition, no doubt if the police were seeking a formal identification by voice it would be preferable for them to provide the witness with a series of voices to choose from.[44] In an Australian case,[45] a witness claimed to be able to remember the noise made by a particular vehicle's engine, and after listening to eight vehicles picked the one belonging to the accused.

Expert evidence based on the comparison of the suspect's voice with a recording of the perpetrator's voice may also be admitted. In R. v. Robb,[46] such evidence was admitted even though the expert had used an approach which the majority of experts thought was unreliable."[47]

In United States Shipping Board v. The Ship St. Albans, 1931 PC 189; Lord MERRIVLE observed that clearly a photographic picture cannot be relied upon as proof in itself, of the dimensions of the depicted object or objects, and cannot be made properly available to establish the relative proportions of such objects except by evidence of personal knowledge or scientific experience to demonstrate accurately the facts sought to be established..... It is well-settled that for certain purposes, photographs may be received in evidence, and, as is well known, photographs are used and can properly be used in proceedings where there is a dispute about identification of a particular person and where the question of identification is a critical one.[48] A photograph can be used in evidence as a faithful reproduction when original is not available, if it is not a false or faked one, and no trick photography is involved.[49]

(a) Factors to be considered.—Factors relevant to be taken into consideration in the identification are whether there was an opportunity for the witnesses to see the accused at the time of the incident, whether they could remember by face the accused persons and whether they could identify them by such memory in the Court.[50]

(b) Personal Characteristics, etc.—"When a party's identity is in issue it may be proved or disproved presumptively by similarity or dissimilarity of personal characteristics, e.g. age, height, size, hair, complexion, voice, handwriting, manner, dress, distinctive marks, faculties, as well as of residence, occupation, family relationship, education, travel, religion, knowledge of particular people, places, or facts, and other details of personal history.[51] In the well-known case of R. v. Voisin,[52] the accused's peculiar misspelling of the words "bloody Belgian"[53] helped to establish his identity as the murderer. In a series of recent cases, the Courts have struggled with the problem of how to prove that a person charged with driving when disqualified was indeed the same person who was previously disqualified. In the case which prompted the series[54] it was suggested that if the accused did not admit the prior disqualification it could only be proved by evidence of matching fingerprints[55] or testimony from someone who was present in Court at the time of the previous conviction and disqualification. This proved highly inconvenient,[56] and it has not been confirmed that proof of coincidence of name and date of birth will usually suffice to establish a case to answer, and that thereafter refusal to give evidence could be taken into account.[57]

In civil cases, a party's identity most frequently comes in question as having executed a particular document; and here identity of name, handwriting, residence and occupation, or even of name and handwriting alone, will generally suffice."[58]

(c) Identification by Gait, Speech and Voice.—To recognise a person in a pitch dark night merely by modulations of his voice is a very risky experiment; it is not safe to rely on the identification of a person by his voice alone.[59] Especially if, prior to the occurrence, the witness did not talk with the accused and did not hear his voice.[60]

The identification of a person by the timbre of his voice, depending upon subtle variations in the overtones, when the person recognising is not familiar with the person recognised, may be some what risky in criminal trials, but when the person recognising was intimately known to the person recognised (in this case the witness met the accused on several occasions prior to the date of occurrence) and the witnesses had heard the accused and his brothers calling the deceased to come out of the hut, it was held that the identification of the accused by the witness by voice was not improbable.[61] A well acquainted person can be recognised without mistake by voice, and more especially in the flashes of torch light.[62] In a dark night one can recognise one's close relation, who is also an inmate of the house, by his voice.[63] Where the witness identified the accused in a dark night by his voice, when it was raining, and the accused was not intimately known to the witness nor was there any conversation prior to that night, it was held that the identification cannot be relied on.[64]

(d) Identification by Perception.—The evidence of persons that they recognised the plaintiff who disappeared several years ago, was held admissible. When they saw the plaintiff after his reappearance, they could recognise him by their past recollection of that person.[65]

The power of perception and memorising differs from man to man and also depends upon the situation, the strength or trustworthiness of the witnesses.[66]

(e) Identification by Hair.—The Supreme Court held that by microscopic examination of hair one can decide wherefrom the hair came.[67] Taking hair sample of the accused during investigation does not amount to furnishing evidence against oneself and the prosecution can be granted permission to obtain his hair sample for the purpose of comparison during investigation.[68]

(f) Identification by Finger-Prints, Foot-Prints, Handwriting and Palm-Prints.—An accused cannot raise the plea that the finger-prints of the other accused found at the place and time of occurrence could not be proved by the prosecution to be his when the other accused did not challenge the said evidence.[69]

(g) Photographs and video-films.—PHIPSON[70] states : A photograph or film of a crime actually being committed is admissible.[71] A jury may be invited to make an identification by comparing the image with the appearance of the accused and this will not be treated as equivalent to a dock identification. Nonetheless, the jury should be given a careful warning about the risks of error in this procedure, and the accused is free to absent himself from the dock.[72] The jury may be assisted by being shown other pictures of the accused.[73] If in the circumstances the jury cannot be expected to identify the accused from the photograph or film, for instance because the photograph or film is unclear,[74] or because the accused has changed his appearance,[75] a witness who has studied the photograph or film may identify the people on it.[76] The witness's evidence may be based on the use of facial-mapping,[77] video-superimposition[78] or repeated viewing.[79]

A witness may give evidence of having identified a person from a photograph or film even if the photograph or film has been lost or destroyed before the trial.[80] Care must be taken, however, to avoid the prejudice to the accused which might result from a revelation that the accused was recognised because of his previous encounters with the police.[81]

(i) DNA evidence.—"This evidence involves comparison between genetic material thought to come from the person whose identity is in issue and a sample of genetic material from a known person. If the samples do not "match" then this will prove a lack of identity between the known person and the person from whom the unknown sample originated. If the samples do "match" this does not conclusively prove identity. Rather, an expert will be able to derive from a database of DNA samples an appropriate number reflecting how often a similar DNA "profile" or "fingerprint" is found."[85]

(j) Identification by sniffer dogs.—The evidence based on sniffer dogs has inherent frailities. The possibility of error on the part of the dog or its master is the first among them. The possibility of misunderstanding between the dog and its master is close to its heels. The possibility of misrepresentation or a wrong inference from the behaviour of the dog could not be ruled out. The last, but not the least, is the fact that from a scientific point of view, there is little knowledge and much uncertainty as to the precise faculties which enable police dogs to track and identify criminal. Police dogs are engaged in these acts by virtue of instincts and also by the training imparted to them. The Criminal Courts need not therefore bother much about the evidence based on sniffer dogs. can afford to make attempts or forays with the help of canine faculties but judicial exercise can ill afford them.[86]

Calling of dog squad would not necessarily lead to the only inference that the perpetrator of the offence were not identified.[87]

17. IDENTIFICATION OF SUSPECT BY WITNESS

Ability of witness to identify should be tested without showing him the suspect, or his photograph, or furnishing him date for identification. Showing photograph prior to identification makes identification worthless.[88]

Where a constable made a reference during the cross-examination to a photograph of the accused which he had seen in a book of photographs that was used for purpose of identifying the person who had committed the crime, it was held that his evidence is admissible.[89] If the identification of persons on the basis of a photograph is to be held to have the same value as the evidence of a test identification parade, gross injustice to the detriment of the persons suspected may result.[90] However, it cannot be said that the identification by photo is inadmissible in evidence. The prosecution has to examine the identifying witness in the Court where he has to identify the accused. Then alone it would become substantive evidence. But that does not mean that at the stage of framing of charge, the Court is disabled from considering the prospect of such a witness correctly identifying the accused during trial. In so considering the Court can take into account the fact that during the investigation the photograph of the accused was shown to the witness and he identified the person as the one whom he saw at the relevant time.[91]

The police may show a number of photographs of different persons so as to evaluate the impression of the witness as to whether he can identify the suspect or not. But showing him the photograph of the suspect before the identification makes the identification parade a farce. Where the police official posed for photograph with the accused with names written on planks in the hands of the accused and the photographs were sent for publication, the identification parade was held to be farcical.[92]

A superimposed photograph of the deceased over the skeleton of a human body was held admissible by the Supreme Court to prove the fact that the skeleton was that of the deceased.[93] The skeleton can be identified by its physical or visual examination with reference to any particular feature which would mark it as belonging to the person whose bones or skeleton it is stated to be; similarly, the size of the bones, their angularity or curvature, the prominences or the recessions, would be features which on examination and comparison may serve to establish 'the identity of a thing' within the meaning of this section.[94]

Where the medical officer who conducted the autopsy on a decomposed body, opined that he found marks of injuries on the body, and decomposition was not so advanced as to defy identification, it was held that the medical officer's opinion is relevant as supporting the prosecution.[95]

Pieces of bones were recovered and the chemical examiner opined that they were most probably of a female aged between 16 and 20 years, but he was not clear whether they belonged to a single individual. He stated in his report, that in regard to the cuts on the bones which he noticed, he was not sure that they must have been caused ante-mortem. On those facts the Madras High Court, held that the corpus delicti was not proved.[96]

Where the doctor gave an opinion that a skull which was found was probably that of a female 12 years old, and there was evidence that the girl was last seen in that direction, and no one else except the girl was reported missing, it was held that it may be concluded that the remains were that of the girl, taking several other circumstances into account.[1] A skeleton found in a jungle was identified as that of a milk-man, who was alleged to have been murdered. The medical evidence was that the bones belonged to an adult male of 30-50 years of age. It was held that the probabilities, when taken with other circumstances, pointed out that the skeleton was that of the deceased.[2] The delay in conducting the identification of a dead body from the skeletons recovered, has to be taken into consideration, in appreciating the evidence.[3]

Where a dead body was found in a decomposed state, unfit for purpose of any examination, it was held that the body may be identified taking into account the height, and the age of the deceased and his clothes.[4]

Where the instructions contained in the Criminal Manual issued by the High Court were not complied with in conducting the T.I. parade, the identification evidence could not be accepted.[5] Where this distinctive mark that two accused persons had one leg each amputed and one accused had small pox marks on his face still no person having small pox marks was mixed up while conducting the T.I. parade, the evidence of identification could not be relied upon[6] but where the scar mark on the face of one of the accused was not so distinct as to demarcate itself from others, non-mixing of persons with such distinctive mark, did not vitiate the test identification parade.[7]

18. IDENTIFICATION OF ACCUSED IN DIFFERENT OFFENCES

Where two separate cases of dacoity were filed against the same accused, in two different courts, and where a test identification was done in one case, the Supreme Court, held that if in one case the evidence of test identification was not acted upon, it cannot be a ground for rejecting that evidence of identification in another case, as the question, whether such identification is trustworthy or not, depends upon the facts and circumstances of each case.[8]

Where there are two suspects dissimilar in appearance, two separate parades should be held.[9]

Identification of one out of four persons held not sufficient for conviction. However, correct identification by three out of four persons was held to be sufficient to bring home the guilt of the accused.[10] Evidence of witnesses who could identify two out of three accused in the dacoity, cannot be rejected merely because, by some mistake, one accused could not be identified.[11]

Evidence of witnesses as to the identification of a large number of dacoits cannot be accepted without corroboration.[12]

The value of identification parade is not reduced by the mere defect in conducting it by a competent Magistrate.[13]

Where a chart was prepared by the Magistrate at the identification parade, and he was not examined to prove the particulars of the chart, such report is no evidence of the identification.[14]

Statements made by the identifying witness to the Magistrates who is conducting the identification parade, are admissible.[15]

19. BENEFIT OF DOUBT

Where the eye-witness failed to identify one of the nine accused persons, benefit of doubt should go to that one accused and not to others.[16] In a case involving a large of accused, benefit of doubt was given to the accused who were not identified by more than one witness but conviction of those identified by at least two reliable witnesses was maintained.[17]

Things said or done by conspirator in reference to common design.

S. 10. Where there is reasonable ground to believe that two or more persons have conspired together to commit an offence or an actionable wrong, anything said, done or written by any one of such persons in reference to their common intention, after the time when such intention was first entertained by any one of them, is a relevant fact as against each of the persons believed to be so conspiring, as well for the purpose of proving the existence of the conspiracy as for the purpose of showing that any such person was a party to it.

ILLUSTRATION

Reasonable ground exists for believing that A has joined in a conspiracy to wage war against the Government of India.

The facts that B procured arms in Europe for the purpose of the conspiracy, C collected money in Calcutta for a like object, D persuaded persons to join the conspiracy in Bombay, E published writings advocating the object in view at Agra, and F transmitted from Delhi to G at Cabul the money which C had collected at Calcutta, and the contents of a letter written by H giving an account of the conspiracy, are each relevant, both to prove the existence of the conspiracy, and to prove A's complicity in it, although he may have been ignorant of all of them, and although the persons by whom they were done were strangers to him, and although they may have taken place before he joined the conspiracy or after he left it.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

The principle on which the acts and declarations of other conspirators, and acts done at different times, are admitted in evidence against the persons prosecuted, is that, by the act of conspiring together, the conspirators have jointly assumed to themselves, as a body, the attitude of individuality, so far as regards the prosecution of the common design; thus rendering whatever is done or said by any one, in furtherance of that design, a part of the res gestae and, therefore, the fact of all.

According to PHIPSON (15th Edn. (2000), para 29-10, p. 728): "Where two persons are engaged in a common enterprise, the acts and declarations of the one in pursuance of that common purpose are admissible against the other. This rule applies in both civil and criminal cases and, in the latter, whether there is a charge of conspiracy or not, provided that the crime charged was committed in pursuance of a conspiracy; i.e., an agreement of two or more persons to commit it."

The mens rea in a conspiracy consists in the intention to execute the illegal elements in the conduct contemplated by the agreement, in the knowledge of those facts which render the conduct illegal.[18]

"The admissions of one conspirator are receivable against the other if they relate to an act done in furtherance of the conspiracy, but not otherwise."[19]

See discussion under side-heading 'Co-conspirators', MC CORMICK ON EVIDENCE, 1984, 3rd Edn., pp. 792-794.

In Bhagwan Swarup v. State of Maharashtra[20] the Supreme Court has laid down the conditions under which Section 10 becomes applicable in the following terms:—

"This section, as the opening words indicate will come into play only when the court is satisfied that there is reasonable ground to believe that two or more persons have conspired together to commit an offence or an actionable wrong, that is to say, there should be a prima facie evidence that a person was a party to the conspiracy, before his acts can be used against his co-conspirators. Once such a reasonable ground exists, anything said, done or written by one of the conspirators, in reference to the common intention, after the said intention was entertained, is relevant against the others, not only for the purpose of proving the existence of the conspiracy but also for proving that the other person was a party to it. The evidentiary value of the said acts is limited by two circumstances, namely, that the acts shall be in reference to their common intention and in respect of a period after such intention was entertained by any one of them. The expression "in reference to their common intention" is very comprehensive and it appears to have been designedly used to give it a wider scope than the words "in furtherance of" in the English Law; with the result, anything said, done or written by a co-conspirator, after the conspiracy was formed, will be evidence against the other before he entered the field of conspiracy or after he left it. Another important limitation implicit in the language is indicated by the expressed scope of its relevancy. Anything so said, done, or written, is a relevant fact only "as against each of the persons believed to be so conspiring as well for the purpose of proving the existence of the conspiracy as for the purpose of showing that any such person was a party to it." It can only be used for the purpose of proving the existence of the conspiracy or that the other person was a party to it. It cannot be used in favour of the other party or for the purpose of showing that such a person was not a party to the conspiracy. In short, the section can be analysed as follows: (1) there shall be a prima facie evidence affording a reasonable ground for a court to believe that two or more persons are members of a conspiracy; (2) if the said condition is fulfilled, anything said, done, or written by any of them in reference to their common intention will be evidence against the other; (3) anything said, done or written by him should have been said, done or written by him after the intention was formed by any one of them; (4) it would also be relevant for the said purpose against another who entered the conspiracy, whether it was said, done or written before he entered the conspiracy or after he left it; and (5) it can only be used against a co-conspirator and not in his favour."

20. (1964) 2 SCJ 771 at 776 : AIR 1965 SC 682.

The Supreme Court[21] observed: "Section 10 of the Evidence Act has been deliberately enacted in order to make such acts and statements of a co-conspirator admissible against the whole body of conspirators, because of the nature of the crime. A conspiracy is hatched in secrecy, and executed in darkness. Naturally, therefore, it is not feasible for the prosecution to connect each isolated act or statement of one accused with the acts or statements of the others, unless there is a common bond linking all of them together. Ordinarily, specially in a criminal case, one person cannot be made responsible for the acts or statements of another. It is only when there is evidence of a concerted action in furtherance of a common responsibility, on the principle that every one concerned in a conspiracy, is acting as the agent of the rest of them. As soon as the Court has reasonable grounds to believe that there is identity of interest or community of purpose between a number of persons, any act done, or any statement or declaration made, by any one of the co-conspirators, is, naturally, held to be the act or statement of the other conspirators, if the act or the declaration has any relation to the subject of the conspiracy. Otherwise, stray acts done in darkness in prosecution of an object hatched in secrecy, may not become intelligible without reference to the common purpose running through the chain of acts or illegal omission attributable to individual members of the conspiracy." The facts of the case are A and B went to an inspector of police and asked him to hush up the case against B and said that the Inspector would be amply rewarded. Then, when A went with money to the Inspector, A was arrested and the money was seized. After investigation A and B were charged under Section 120-B. IPC. The question was whether the statements made by A, that he was sent by B with the money to be offered by way of bribe to the police officer, was admissible against B. It was held that, as both A and B went together with the proposal to hush up the case, it was clear evidence of the two persons having conspired to commit an offence of bribing a public servant and so the charge under Section 120-B was proper; that being so, anything done or said by any one of the two, with reference to the common intention, i.e., conspiracy to offer bribe, was equally admissible against both of them. That statement was admissible not only to prove that B had constituted A his agent in the preperation of the crime but also to prove the existence of the conspiracy itself.

This section is based on the theory of agency. In Civil Law, there is vicarious liability of the master for the acts done by his servants, and of the principal for the acts of his agent, etc. In criminal cases, the theory of agency is applied in a limited extent to an offence like conspiracy. This section is based on the identity of interest existing between the conspirators; when the concerned action is proved, then the principle underlining this section comes into play and each conspirator would become an agent for the other. To put it in other words, the acts done by one conspirator in pursuance of the common desire or intentity of interest are admissible against his fellow conspirators.[22]

If two or more persons conspire together to commit an offence, each is regarded as being the agent of the other, and just as the principal is liable for the acts of the agent, so also each conspirator is liable for what is done by his fellow-conspirator, in furtherance of the common intention entertained by both of them.[23]

In Sardul Singh v. State of Bombay,[24] after referring to the Privy Council decision in Mirza Akbar's case[25], the Supreme Court observed: "On well-established authority, the principle underlying the reception of evidence, under Section 10, of the statements, act and writings of one co-conspirator as against the other is on the theory of agency.....The admission of such evidence, in proof of conspiracy or of the fact that he was a co-conspirator, is, in essence, admission not as against himself but as against the others who are on trial. To the extent that such an issue, e.g., of there being a conspiracy and of his being a co-conspirator is relevant at the trial, it must be proved only by evidence under Section 10. Evidence Act, which is an exceptional section limited in its application to conspiracies to commit an offence or to commit an actionable wrong."[26]

Under Section 34 of the Indian Penal Code, when a criminal act is done by several persons, in furtherance of the common intention of all, each of such persons is liable for that act in the same manner as if it were done by him alone. This section makes admissible in evidence things said or done by a conspirator in reference to the common design. It applies to crimes as well as torts, i.e., to joint offenders as well as joint tort-feasors. It has no bearing on the question as to how far a conspiracy to commit an offence or actionable wrong is an offence under the Indian Penal Code. It is based upon the principle that, when several persons conspire to commit a crime or a tort, each makes the rest his agent to carry the plan into execution. If the acts of one conspirator to commit an illegal act are proved, the act of one conspirator becomes an act of the other.

If two or more persons conspire together to commit an offence, each is regarded as being the agent of the other, and just as the principal is liable for the acts of the agent, so also each conspirator is liable for what is done by his fellow-conspirator, in furtherance of the common intention entertained by both of them.[27]

As the principle of this section is to ensure that one person shall not be made responsible for the acts and deeds of another until some bondage in the nature of agency has been established between them, the acts, words or writing of another which is proposed to be attributed vicariously to the person charged must be in reference to their common intention or design and after such design was entertained.[28]

Unlike in England where the wife and husband are regarded as one person for certain purposes, there is no rule in India that the wife and husband constitute one person for purposes of criminal law; and both may be charged with conspiracy with a third person.[29]

The evidence of a conspirator is admissible against his co-conspirator on the principle that the thing done, written or spoken was something done in carrying out the conspiracy, and is receivable as a step in the proof of the conspiracy. The words written or spoken may be a declaration accompanying an act and indicating the quality of the act as being an act in the course of the conspiracy or the words written or spoken may in themselves be acts done in the course of the conspiracy.

Once the common intention ceased to exist any statement made by a former conspirator thereafter cannot be regarded as one made "in reference to their common intention." In other words, a post-arrest statement made to a police officer, whether it is a confession or otherwise, touching his involvement in the conspiracy, would not fall within the ambit of Section 10. Confessional statement of the accused who is no more alive is of no evidentiary value.[30]

The provisions of Section 10 come into operation in a case when two or more persons have conspired together to commit an offence and are prosecuted under any penal provision. Where the petitioners were not being prosecuted but were detained under the provisions of COFEPOSA Act, this section is not applicable to them.[31] Section 10, which is an exception to the general rule, while permitting the statement made by one conspirator to be admissible as against another conspirator, restricts it to the statement made during the period when the agency subsisted. Once it is shown that a person became snapped out of the conspiracy, any statement made subsequent thereto cannot be used as against the other conspirators under this section. Whether a particular accused had ceased to be a conspirator or not, at any point of time, is a matter which can be decided on the facts of that particular case. Normally, a conspirator's connection with the conspiracy would get snapped after he is nabbed by the police and kept in their custody because he would thereby cease to be the agent of the other conspirators. In the instant case, the prosecution could not establish that the accused who were arrested, continued to conspire with those conspirators remaining outside. At any rate it cannot be said that the confession made by an accused can be used as substantive evidence against the other co-accused on the principle enunciated in Section 10. Thus, the confessional statement made by an accused after his arrest, if admissible and reliable, can be used against a confessor as substantive evidence, but its use against the other co-accused would be limited only for the purpose of corroboration of other evidence.[32]

2. "REASONABLE GROUND TO BELIEVE"

The operation of this section is strictly conditional upon there being reasonable ground to believe that two or more persons have conspired together to commit an offence.[33] There must be reason to believe that there was a conspiracy and the accused persons were members of that conspiracy.[34]

In order to decide whether any act done or statement made or thing written by an alleged conspirator is admissible in evidence against any person, the test is to see first, whether there is reasonable ground to believe that a conspiracy existed between him and such person; and, secondly, whether such act, statement or writing had reference to their common intention.[35]

This expression means that there should exist prima facie evidence in support of the existence of conspiracy between two accused, and it is then only that anything said, done, written by one can be used against the other.[36] The application of this section follows the findings that there is a reasonable ground to believe that a conspiracy exists and certain persons are conspirators, and it does not precede that finding.[37]

Where the accused persons who were connected with the investigation of a crime had to associate with their colleagues who were also investigating the crime, this association alone could not be considered by itself to be incriminating; in the absence of any other evidence which would make out a reasonable ground for holding them to be members of the conspiracy; they were entitled to be acquitted.[38] The statements made by the co-conspirators can be used by the Court for purposes mentioned in Section 10 only after the basic satisfaction is arrived at, and that satisfaction must be based upon reasonable ground which, from the nature of things, must be founded on some different material, or some other independent evidence.[39] Where the finding of the High Court was that there was reasonable ground to believe that the appellant and the other accused had conspired together, the confessional statement made by him could be used against the other accused also.[40]

The Calcutta High Court following the Privy Council case in Gill v. R,[41] held: Once a reasonable ground to believe that several persons have conspired to commit an offence exists, the acts and declarations of a particular person in reference to the common intention are relevant facts, although that person may not so much as even know of the existence of many others engaged in the conspiracy, or they are utter strangers to him. A trial Judge may admit evidence under Section 10 of the Evidence Act; yet, he may reject it, if at a later stage of the trial that ground of belief is displaced by further evidence. In Gill's case the Privy Council observed that in the same reasoning an appellate court which has from the outslet refused that belief must refuse also to admit evidence which was admissible only upon the footing of the belief being entertained. It is not necessary that in a conspiracy charge, evidence once admitted remains admissible evidence whatever new aspect the case may assume, whether in the original or in the appellate court.[42]

3. CONSPIRACY

Conspiracy consists in a combination or agreement between two or more persons to do an unlawful act or to do a lawful act by unlawful means.

The constituent elements of criminal conspiracy consist of: (1) an agreement between two or more persons; (2) to do an illegal act; (3) to do a legal act by illegal means; (4) an overt act done in pursuance of the conspiracy.[43]

Section 120-A, Indian Penal Code, defines conspiracy as follows: "When two or more persons agree to do, or cause to be done, an illegal act or an act which is not illegal, by illegal means, such an agreement amounts to criminal conspiracy. Provided that no agreement, except an agreement to commit an offence, shall amount to a criminal conspiracy unless some act besides the agreement is done by one or more parties to such an agreement in pursuance thereof.

The Indian Penal Code makes a few exceptions as in the case of English Law of conspiracy viz. Section 311 IPC (Thug), Section 400, IPC (belonging to a gang of dcoits), Section 401, IPC (belonging to a gang of thieves), Section 402, IPC (being a member of an Assembly of dacoits), Section 121-A, IPC (conspiring to wage war). In the above cases the accused is punishable whether an act is done or not and, even if the offence is committed or not in furtherance of the conspiracy. Besides that he is also punishable separately for every offence committed in furtherance of the conspiracy.

This section has nothing to do with the question as to how far a conspiracy to commit an offence or actionable wrong is an offence under the IPC.[44]

Only one overt-act by itself is not sufficient for infering that there was participation in a criminal conspiracy.[45]

The offence of conspiracy would be complete when two or more persons conspire to do or cause to be done an illegal act, or an act which is not illegal, by illegal means. It is immaterial whether or not the illegal act is the ultimate object of the conspirators.[46]

For further cases reference may be made to commentaries on the Indian Penal Code.

4. TWO OR MORE PERSONS HAVE CONSPIRED TOGETHER—NO CONSPIRACY BY ONE INDIVIDUAL

Section itself states that when two or more persons conspired etc: it follows that there must be two or more persons for committing an offence of conspiracy. Following the decision in King v. Plummer[47], the Allahabad High Court, in Gulab Singh v. Emperor[48] observed: "It is necessary in a prosecution for conspiracy to prove that there were two or more persons agreeing for purpose of conspiracy and that there could not be a conspiracy of one.[49] In that case the Jury found one of the two accused was not a party to the agreement, and acquitted him. It was held that it follows as a matter of course that the other accused cannot be convicted of that charge, as to constitute conspiracy, the assent of both the accused was necessary.

When three persons were charged two of them were found having no concern with the conspiracy, it was held that the third person also cannot be convicted even on his own confession.[50]

5. AGREE TO CONSPIRE TOGETHER

There is a distinction between conspiracy and other offences in that, conspiracy consists simply in an agreement or confederacy to do some act and it is no matter whether it is done or not; but, in other offences, mere intention to do a criminal act in itself is not a crime, until something is done which amounts to doing of an act or attempting to do some act so as to carry out the intention.

Though to establish the charge of conspiracy there must be an agreement, there need not be proof of direct meeting or combination, nor need the parties be brought into each other's presence; the agreement may be inferred from circumstances raising a presumption of a common concerted plan to carry out the unlawful design. So again, it is not necessary that all should have joined in the scheme from the first; those who come in at a later stage are equally guilty, provided the agreement be proved.

So long as the design of the conspirators rests in intention only, it is not indictable.

Where the deceased, the earlier paramour of a woman was last seen in the company of hers and her later paramour and her intimacy with the deceased had revived which the later paramour was averse to, that itself was held to be not sufficient to hold that they had agreed to kill the deceased.[51]

6. CONSPIRACY—PROOF OF CONSPIRACY

According to the section, the proof must relate to anything said or done "in reference to their common intention". The Supreme Court, in Bhagwan Swroop v. State,[52] held that the expression has a wider scope than the words "in furtherance of" in the English Law.[53] There should be prima facie evidence that a person was a party to the conspiracy before his acts can be used against the co-conspirators. Where the accused was charged of conspiring to approve purchase of T.V. sets at hiked prices and there is only a signature put by the accused petitioner in the file, subsequent to the direction of the then Chief Minister to send the revised notes, this act without anything more could not be said to be the outcome of abetment and conspiracy and charge of conspiracy against him was improper.[54] Where there were entries in the diaries regarding acceptance of illegal gratification by the petitioner but there was no evidence on record except the alleged entries to prima facie prove the factum of conspiracy, provisions of Section 10 were not attracted.[55] Where entries in the books of account allegedly showed conspiracy amongst all the accused persons, the prosecution witness only indicated that one of the accused was known to other accused persons and had gone to their residence on formal occasions and the witnesses did not speak even a word about the other accused, it was held that conspiracy was not proved.[56]

The law requires specific proof that each of the conspirators participated with a particular design to do a particular criminal act.[57]

As the essence of conspiracy is secrecy, there may be no witness to say that the conspirators agreed to carryout an unlawful object. It is only from the conduct and the acts of the conspirators, that their agreement can be inferred. The Supreme Court, however, held, in Ramanath v. State[58], that where there was no evidence whatsoever of any pre-meditation or of a pre-arranged plan by the assailant of murdering the deceased, the mere fact that all the accused were seen at the place of offence at the time of firing, did not justify the inference of a common intention.

It is not necessary that more than one person should be convicted for the offence of criminal conspiracy. It is enough if the court can find that two or more persons were actually concerned in the criminal conspiracy.[59]

In view of the secrecy among the conspirators, it is from the members of the family or from the persons who are intimately connected with those persons, or from their associates, the evidence of conspiracy can be gathered.[60] Conspiracy may be inferred from the criminal acts done by the alleged conspirators.[61] The agreement to conspire may be inferred from circumstances which raise a presumption of a concerted plan to carry out an unlawful design.[62] Conspiracy can be proved by circumstantial evidence.

Sixteen accused were tried for an offence under Section 121-A, IPC, the evidence that was sought to be relied, consisted of some documents and letters which were in the handwriting of some of the accused, and which were seized from them by the police. It was held that the handwriting of the different accused can be proved by the witnesses acquainted with the handwriting, and it is relevant under Section 47, of this Act, and that, as it is always difficult to secure outside independent evidence, it can be proved by the conduct of the accused, and the documents and letters. When a letter is found with a conspirator, and its writer and addressee are known, it is admissible against other conspirators. The possession of documents creates an inference that the possessor is aware of its contents, that the agreement may be inferred from the circumstances giving to a presumption of common concerted plan to carry out the unlawful design.[63]

Where an accused got examined himself as a defence witness, his evidence relating to a communication between one conspirator and the other during the period when the conspiracy was going on, and which related to implementing the conspiracy, was held relevant though whether such evidence can be relied upon or not is a separate issue.[64]

In Baburao Bajirao Patil v. State of Maharashtra[65], it was held that in a case of conspiracy in which only circumstantial evidence is forthcoming, when the broad features are proved by trustworthy evidence connecting all the links of a complete chain, then isolated events and the confessional statements of co-accused lending assurance to the conclusions of the Court can be considered as relevant material.

Conspiracy can be proved by the surrounding circumstances or by the antecedent or subsequent conduct of the accused.[66]

Documents written by the deceased describing conversation with a third person who referred to the accused as a conspirator were held admissible.[67]

In re.: Rangarajulu,[68] it was held that the existence of a secret code by itself is evidence to support the inference that the persons named therein have conspired to commit an offence.

7. ANYTHING SAID, DONE OR WRITTEN

Anything 'said' would include the statements speeches, or declarations made by the person.[69] Evidence of communication between conspirators while the conspiracy is on is admissible.[70] The statements of a co-accused during the trial under Section 342 Cr.P.C. (old) are not admissible against others.[71] Any statements by one conspirator to another about the complicity of a third conspirator is a relevant fact. In R v. Surya,[72] a document had been written by a dead person, referring to her conversation with a third person who told her that the accused was one among his revolutionary friends from whom he used to take guidance. It was held that it was admissible as a statement, and that it was a relevant fact under this section.[73]

The expression 'written' would include the manuscript, whether signed or unsigned; written or typewritten. A letter written by a person who is a stranger to the transaction is not admissible.[74] On a trial for forgery, a letter written by a person, who had no hand in the forgery, to his brother, a stranger to the transaction, was produced. The writer of the letter was not examined; but the letter was allowed to go in under this section. It was held that the letter was not admissible in the absence of evidence that its writer was a conspirator in the fabrication of the will.[75]

This section will apply to 'anything said, done or written' by a conspirator who gives evidence as an approver.[76]

As a matter of prudence corroboration is required of such evidence of an approver unless the Court is satisfied that he is speaking the truth.[77]

8. COMMON INTENTION

The section states that anything said, done or written by one of such persons in reference to their common intention, after the time when such intention was first entertained, is relevant.

In Bhagwan Swaroop v. State,[78] it was held that the expression "In reference to their common intention" is very comprehensive and is designedly used to give a wide scope, with the result that anything said, done or written by a co-conspirator, after the conspiracy is formed will be evidence against the other before he entered the field of conspiracy or after he left it.

The expression refers to the acts intended as a result of common intention of the conspirators, in future, and not to the common intention in the past.[79]

9. ANYTHING SAID OR DONE OR WRITTEN IN REFERENCE TO THE COMMON INTENTION—HEARSAY EVIDENCE

The Judicial Committee, in Mirza Akbar v. Emperor[80] approving Emperor v. Ganesh Raghunath[81] and Emperor v. Abani Bhusan[82] observed: "Their Lordships think the words of Section 10 must be construed in accordance with it and are not capable of being widely construed so as to include a statement made by one conspirator, in the absence of the other, with reference to past acts done in the actual course of carrying out the conspiracy, after it has been completed.....In their Lordships' judgement the words 'common intention' signify a common intention existing at the time when the things was said, done or written by one of them." Their Lordships, while approving the construction placed on this section in Emperor v. Ganesh Raghunath and Emperor v. Abani Bhusan, said that the distinction was rightly drawn between communications between conspirators while the conspiracy was going on with reference to the carrying out of the conspiracy, and the statements made after the arrest or after conspiracy was over, by way of description of past events. Referring to R v. Blake[83] they observed: "what in that case was held to be admissible against the conspirator was the evidence of entries made by his fellow conspirator, contained in various documents actually used for carrying out the fraud. But, a document not created in the course of carrying out the transaction, but made by one of the conspirators after the fraud was completed, was held to be inadmissible against the other." The Privy Council also referred to the principle stated by LORD DENMAN that "a mere statement made by one conspirator to a third party, or any act of such conspirator not done in pursuance of the conspiracy, is not evidence for or against another conspirator." The decision of the Privy Council was relied by the Supreme Court on in Sardul Singh v. State of Bombay[84] which contains an elaborate discussion of the law under Section 10.

These words signify a common intention existing at the time when the thing was said, done or written by one of them. Things said, done or written while the conspiracy was on foot are relevant as evidence of the common intention, once reasonable ground has been shown to believe in its existence. In Bhagwan Das v. State,[85] two persons were charged with defrauding the Government by fabricating three cash memos to appear as if they had purchased medicines and obtained payment against those cash memos. The medical store proprietor who was one of the accused admitted that the cash memos were fictitious and that they were prepared at the instance of the other accused. The Supreme Court, held that the cash memos are in pursuance of an agreement between the two accused and could be used in evidence against both under this section.[86]

It follows that what is said, done or written by one of them after the common intention or conspiracy had ceased to exist would not be admissible against a co-conspirator.[87] In re.: Rama Ratan,[88] one accused asked another accused to supply an explosive to blow up a bridge; after the attempt was made, it failed; he wrote a letter to the other accused asking him to supply explosive again. When both the accused were tried for conspiracy, the letter written for supplying again another explosive was held to be inadmissible. A statement by an absconding accused was made the basis for framing a charge against the accused under Section 120-B, IPC, but that statement was long after the period of alleged conspiracy was over and the purpose of the conspiracy had terminated. It was held that the statement, although made by way of description of past events which happened during the period of conspiracy, was a narrative made to a third party after the common intention or conspiracy was no longer operating and had ceased to exist and, therefore, such statements were inadmissible in evidence against any party other than the maker of the statement.[89]

10. DIFFERENCE BETWEEN ENGLISH AND INDIAN LAW

The main difference is that according to the present section, what the conspirator said, did or wrote must be in reference to his common intention; where as under the English Law, such acts must be in furtherance of the common design. This section is much wider than the English Law. The illustration given under this section would show the comprehensive nature on the subject.[90]

Therefore, the contents of a letter written by one conspirator giving an account of the conspiracy, is relevant against the others, even though it was not written in support of it or in furtherance of it. (Ibid).

Under this section, even after one conspirator ceases to have connection with the conspiracy, his acts are admissible whereas under the English Law, they are not admissible.

The Delhi High Court held that the expression "in reference to their common intention", used in Section 10, is very comprehensive and appears to have been designedly used to give it a wider scope than the words 'in furtherance of' in the English Law. Accordingly, anything said, done or written by a conspirator after the conspiracy was formed will be evidence though the thing was said, done or written before the other conspirator entered the field of conspiracy or the thing was said, done or written by a conspirator after the other left it.

In that case after two people conspired to smuggle gold into India from Pakistan and to send the sale proceeds from India to places outside India, it was that the statements of the accused in relation to the above facts can be used against other conspirator to prove the existence of conspiracy and that other conspirators, known or unknown, were a party to it that their being an identity of interest or community of purpose between the conspirators the statements in question are admissible under this section, as the declarations made in the statements have a relation to the object of the conspiracy.[91]

Anything said, done or written "in reference to the common intention" is admissible, and therefore the contents of letters written by one in reference to the conspiracy is relevant against the others even though not written in support of it or in furtherance of it.[92]

The evidence of a conspirator's subsequent conduct, that is, conduct subsequent to the commission of the offence of conspiracy, is admissible to show that he himself was a conspirator. For the purpose of proving the identity of others, who might have been concerned along with himself in the conspiracy, his subsequent conduct would not be relevant. That identity must be proved by independent evidence. But, for showing the existence of a conspiracy and showing that he himself was a conspirator in that conspiracy, his subsequent conduct is relevant and the evidence about it is admissible under this section.[93]

11. ANTECEDENT CONDUCT

Evidence throwing light on the object of conspiracy like speeches, statements made in speeches, some correspondence between the conspirators who have identity of thought are admissible under this section.[94]

The illustration under this section would show that who one who procured the arms outside the country, another collected money in Calcutta, another persuaded persons to join the conspiracy, another published writing advocating the object, all acts individually are relevant and prove the existence of a conspiracy, though one of them may be ignorant of the several acts done by others at different places.

The conduct and the surrounding circumstances must relate to the offence and must not be too remote. For example, where the facts are that the accused was an associate of the conspirators and was anxious to escape observation, and was doing his best to conceal his whereabouts, after the date of the occurrence connected with the criminal conspiracy, or was assisting the conspirators in their defence, though all relevant, if they fall short of proof of an agreement which is the gist of the crime, then such conduct is not admissible.[95]

12. AGAINST EACH OTHER

This expression is in reference to their common intention and the facts and declarations of which evidence is given in the case can reasonably be said to have reference to the object of the conspiracy. And they will be good evidence not only against the maker but also against others who are believed to be so conspiring.[96]

This expression is intended to prove the existence of a conspiracy, i.e., to show that a person was a party to it, and cannot be used in favour of the other party or for the purpose of showing that such a person was a party to it.[97]

The section applies to acts and declarations of one of body of conspirators in respect of the common design of all. Everything said or done by any of the conspirators in furtherance of the common object is evidence against each and all of the parties concerned, whether they were present or absent. Thus, the cries of the mob, with whose proceedings LORD GORDON was connected, though made in his absence, were held to be admissible against him, as explanatory of the objects which he in common with the multitude had in view.[98]

The section is intended to make evidence communications between different conspirators, while the conspiracy is going on, with reference to the carrying out of the conspiracy.[1]

A confession by a conspirator made to a Magistrate after arrest disclosing the existence of a conspiracy, its objects and the names of its members, is not admissible under this section against the co-conspirators jointly tried with him, but only under S. 30.[2] When a person accused along with others voluntarily comes into the witness-box and deposes as a witness for defence, he is in the same position as an ordinary witness, and is, therefore, subject to cross-examination.[3] The evidence so brought out can be used against his co-accused.[4] If such a witness incriminates his co-accused, he too gets the right to cross-examine him.[5] Once his evidence as a witness for the defence is on record and it speaks of a communication between one conspirator and the other during the existence of the conspiracy and relates to its implementation, it becomes relevant.[6]

13. CONFESSION BY CO-ACCUSED

This section makes admissible evidence only communications between different conspirators. This section is not intended to make the confession of a co-accused as evidence and put on the same footing as a communication passing between different conspirators with reference to the conspiracy, though it may be considered under Section 30, of this Act. The value of such confession cannot be placed higher than the statement of an accomplice which, as a rule of prudence, requires corroboration.[7]

Though in some cases,[8] it was held to the contrary, they cannot be good law in view of the later Privy Council decision in Mirza Akbar's case.[9]

In Haricharan v. State[10], it was held that the confession of a co-accused cannot be treated as substantive evidence and can be pressed into service only when the court is inclined to accept other evidence and feels the necessity for an assurance in support of its conclusion deductible from the said evidence. Where the other evidence is wholly unsatisfactory, the prosecution cannot rely on the confession of the co-accused, as against the presumption of innocence which applies to an accused person. This case was distinguished in Baburao Bajirao v. State[11]. It was held that where only circumstantial evidence is forthcoming and broad features are proved by trustworthy evidence connecting all the links forming a complete chain, then on isolated events, the confessional statements of the co-accused can be considered for lending assurance to the conclusions of the Court.

In the absence of any reliable and trustworthy evidence such confession cannot be used in a conspiracy case.[12] In another case it was held that in the absence of reliable evidence beyond reasonable doubt confession of a co-accused cannot be used against others.[13]

The satisfaction of the court as regards the existence of the conspiracy must be based upon some other independent evidence and not by virtue of confessional statements of the co-conspirator, though it is relevant under this section.[14]

Statement of an accused to a doctor, though incriminating, is not a confession and not hit by Section 26 of the Act.[15]

14. WHEN SUCH INTENTION WAS FIRST ENTERTAINED BY ANY ONE OF THEM

This wording used in the section is intended to fix the period from which time the evidence can be adduced as to the facts said and done or written by any one of the conspirators and which took place before the common intention ceased to exist.[16]

A agreed to supply B one packet of explosive for purpose of blowing up a railway bridge and B along with C used the explosive, but his attempt proved unsuccessful; later B wrote a letter to A mentioning his unsuccessful attempt and asked him to supply some more explosive substance. On those facts it was held by the Madras High Court, that the letter of B was not admissible against A, as the common intention had ceased to exist after the attempt to blow up the bridge failed.[17]

15. RETRACTED CONFESSION

A retracted confession of co-accused does not constitute substantive evidence within the meaning of Section 3 of this Act. It can only be taken into account by the Court in arriving at its conclusions. Its value however, depends on the facts and circumstances of each case. It has also to be borne in mind that a retracted confession being a weak link even against the maker, it must necessarily be more so against the co-accused.[18]

Retracted confession can form the basis of a conviction if corroborated on material particulars by other evidence. Such confession of an accused can be used against others when conspiracy on their part is proved.[19]

16. STATEMENT OF APPROVER

Section 10 would apply to the evidence of an approver with reference to anything said, done or written by him. But there must be reasonable grounds for believing the evidence of the approver. It requires corroboration on material particulars for relying on that evidence. If the evidence of the approver is found to be unreliable, the question of corroboration would not arise.[20] When a conspirator is given pardon by the court he becomes an approver on certain conditions according to law; and he is expected to give out the truth to the court. At times to avail of the pardon one may become an approver. Therefore, it is necessary as a rule of prudence, to require corroboration, of his evidence specially in the case of conspiracies.[21]

The possession of a document would be evidence to show that the conspirator in whose possession it was found had received and preserved it, though the execution or authorship of the document is a question of fact. Regarding documents found in possession on search or otherwise. they are admissible only where it is proved that it is in the handwriting of the concerned person. The mere fact that it is found in one's possession does not prove the truth of its contents against the other accused.[22]

Where there was correspondence between one accused living in India and a revolutionary in Berlin, it was held that it was not incumbent to show that the letters were in fact written by the other in Berlin and that it was enough to show that some person in Berlin was in conspiracy with the accused and correspondence was passing between them.[23] Where a postcard was written by one accused who was in prison to another accused, it is admissible as the document is not in the nature of a mere confession provided the conditions of Section 10 are complied with.[24]

But the Nagpur High Court held that any statement made by a conspirator after his arrest is not admissible against others under Section 10, though it may be admissible under Section 30 as a confession of a co-accused.[25]

17. SECTION 10—120-B, INDIAN PENAL CODE

As a general rule, evidence of commission or commissions constituting the offence is to be confined to the period mentioned in the charge; for the purpose of charge of conspiracy, however, there cannot be a blanket ban, as there are certain provisions of the Evidence Act, other than Section 10, with the aid of which evidence outside the period mentioned in the charge can be admitted and relied upon. In a charge of conspiracy, conduct in general of each conspirator including his acts, writings and statements is evidence against himself. Such conduct, irrespective of the time to which it relates, can be relied upon by the prosecution to show the criminality of the intention of the individual accused with reference to his proved participation in the alleged conspiracy. Such evidence will be admissible under Sections 8 and 14 of the Evidence Act.[26]

In Badri Rai v. State of Bihar[27], the facts were when an Inspector of Police was on his way to the police station, A and B approached him with a request to hush up a criminal case pending investigation against B for a reward; the Inspector drew up F.I.R., of the offer of the bribe on his own statement and prepared a seizure list of the money offered to him; at once the inspector arrested A; after usual investigation A and B were put on trial under Section 120-B read with Section 165-A, Indian Penal Code and they were convicted. Dealing with that case, their Lordships posed the question whether the statement made by A that he was sent by B with the money to be offered by way of bribe to the Inspector was admissible against A. It was observed: "The incident when both A and B approached the Inspector with the proposal that he should hush up the case against B for which he would be amply rewarded, was clear evidence of the two persons having conspired to commit the offence of bribing a public servant in connection with the discharge of his public duties. Therefore, the charge under Section 120-B had been properly framed against both of them. That being so, anything said or done by one of the two, with reference to the common intention, namely, the conspiracy to offer bribe, was equally admissible against both of them. That statement was admissible not only to prove that B had constituted A his agent in the perpetration of the crime, but also prove the existence of the conspiracy itself."

18. SECTION 10—120-A, INDIAN PENAL CODE

Where the accused were charged with criminal conspiracy under Section 120-A, Indian Penal Code for an offence of using a forged document as genuine and thereby dishonestly obtaining money, it was held that proof of conspiracy to commit forgery for purpose of cheating is admissible under this section.[28]

Where two accused were put on trial for smuggling gold into India from Pakistan and remitting the sale proceeds from India to outside India, it was held that, there being an identify of interest or community of purpose between the conspirators, the statements of the conspirator are admissible under this section, as the declarations made in the statements have a relation to the object of the conspiracy; the essence of conspiracy is that there should be an agreement between two or more persons to do an act of enumerated in Section 120-A of the Penal Code. Statements refering to the activities of the co-accused or with reference to their common intention are relevant as against each of the persons believed to have so conspired, as well as for the purpose of proving the existence of the conspiracy as also for the purpose of showing that any such person was a party to it.[29]

When the acts of accused persons fall within the definition of making 'False Documents; by preparing parts of the documents separately, but acting in concert with each other it was held that the conviction under Section 468 read with Section 120-A Indian Penal Code is to be upheld, as the several acts of the accused are admissible under this Section.[30]

19. SECTION 10—121-A INDIAN PENAL CODE

Where there were 16 accused in a conspiracy case, it was found that some of the documents and letters seized from them were in the handwriting of some of the accused, and some witnesses identified the handwriting of some of the accused. It was held that the handwriting of the different accused identified by some prosecution witnesses acquainted with it is relevant under Section 47 of the Evidence Act. When a letter is found with a conspirator, and its writer and addresses are known, they are admissible as relevant under this section to prove the existence of the conspiracy against other conspirator. The possession of a document creates an inference that the possessor is aware of its content; in order to establish conspiracy, an agreement may be infered from circumstances raising a presumption of common concerted plan to carry out the unlawful design.[31]

20. HEARSAY EVIDENCE

Normally, hearsay evidence is not admissible unless it explains any accompanying conduct of a co-conspirator but, subject to certain conditions, it is admissible under Section 10.[32]

21. CRIMINAL BREACH OF TRUST

It was held by the Supreme Court in Sardul Singh v. State[33] that where a charge against the accused specified the period of conspiracy, the evidence of the act of co-conspirators outside the period is not receivable; but in the cases of criminal breach of trust, all evidence which would go to show that certain transactions are bogus is certainly admissible under other sections of this Act. But that would be notwithstanding that such evidence may refer to and narrate the acts of the conspirators beyond the period of conspiracy, but within reasonable limits.

When facts not otherwise relevant become relevant.

S. 11. Facts not otherwise relevant are relevant—

(1) if they are inconsistent with any fact in issue or relevant fact;

(2) if by themselves or in connection with other facts they make the existence or non-existence of any fact in issue or relevant fact highly probable or improbable.

ILLUSTRATIONS

(a) The question is, whether A committed a crime at Calcutta on a certain day.

The fact that, on that day A was at Lahore is relevant.

The fact that, near the time when the crime was committed, A was at a distance from the place where it was committed, which would render it highly improbable, though not impossible, that he committed it, is relevant.

(b) The question is, whether A committed a crime.

The circumstances are such that the crime must have been committed either by A, B, C or D. Every fact which shows that the crime could have been committed by no one else and that it was not committed by either B, C or D, is relevant.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE—FACTS NOT OTHERWISE RELEVANT

Chapter 2 of this Act deals with relevancy of facts, under Sections 5-55. Leaving out this particular Section 11, other sections in this chapter deal with different types of facts and make them relevant. Certain facts which are not otherwise relevant are made relevant under this section. That is why this section is regarded as a residuary section. They would be relevant provided the conditions specified in clauses (1) & (2) as explained by illustrations are fulfilled. Under the first clause, a fact which is inconsistent with any fact in issue or relevant fact, would be relevant. The following statement by Stephen, the framer of this Act, in his introduction to the Act, which was quoted with approval by the Supreme Court in Ramchander v. State of Haryana[34] contains the best commentary on the second clause. "It may possibly be argued that the effect of the second paragrah of Section 11 would be to admit proof of such facts as these, viz., (i) statements as to facts made by persons not called as witnesses; (ii) transactions similar to but unconnected with the facts in issue; and (iii) opinions formed by persons as to fact in issue; as relevant facts. It may, for instance, be said: "A (not called as a witness) was heard to declare that he had seen B commit a crime". This makes highly probable that B did commit that crime. Therefore, A's declaration is a relevant fact under Section 11(2). This was not the intention of the section, as is shown by the elaborate provision contained in the following part of Chap. II (Sections 32 to 39) as to particular classes of statements, which are regarded as relevant facts either because the circumstances under which they are made invest them with importance, or because evidence can be got. The sort of facts which the section was intended to include are facts which either exclude, or imply more or less distinctly, the existence of the facts sought to be proved. Stephen was of the view that some degree of latitude was designedly left in the wording of the section on account of the variety of matters to which it might apply. The meaning of the section would have been more fully expressed if words to the following effect had been added to it. 'No statement shall be regarded as rendering the matter stated highly probable within the meaning of the section, unless it is declared to be relevant fact under some other section of this Act'."

Under this section, any fact which either disproves, or tends to prove or disprove, any claim or charge in a case is made relevant. The effect of this and the previous section is to make every relevant fact admissible as evidence. Thus, where the question is whether X lent money to Y, evidence of the property of X about the time of the alleged loan is admissible as tending to disprove it. Similarly, where the question is whether X is the child of Y, evidence of the resemblance, or want of resemblance, of X to Y is admissible. In Rex v. Parbhudas[35] WEST J., said:— "Section 11 of the Evidence Act is, no doubt is expressed in terms so extensive that any fact which can, by a chain of ratiocination, be brought into connection with another, so as to have a bearing upon a point in issue, may possibly be held to be relevant within its meaning. But the connections of human affairs are so infinitely various and so far-reaching, that thus to take the section in its widest admissible sense, would be to complicate every trial with a mass of collateral inquiries limited only by the patience and the means of the parties. One of the objects of a law of evidence is to restrict the investigations made by Court within the bounds prescribed by general convenience, and this object would be completely frustrated by the admission, on all occasions, of every circumstance on either side having some remote and conjectural probative force, the precise amount of which might itself be ascertainable only by a long trial and a determination of fresh collateral issue, growing up in endless succession, as the inquiry proceeded. That such an extensive meaning was not in the mind of the legislature, seems to be shown by several indications in the Act itself. The illustrations to Section 11 do not go beyond familiar cases in the English Law of Evidence."

Collateral facts which, by way of contradiction, are inconsistent with a fact in issue or another relevant fact, i.e., which make the existence of a fact in issue or a relevant fact probable or improbable, or which, by way of corroboration, are consistent with the existence of a fact in issue or a relevant fact, i.e., tend to render the existence of a fact in issue or a relevant fact highly probable, are themselves made relevant by the present section.[36]

35. 1874 Bom HCR 90. 91.

36. Rangayyan v. Innasimuthu, AIR 1956 Mad 226.

The words of this section are wide in their scope and the evidence which would be held to be admissible in English Law would be properly admitted under this section.[37]

Questions have arisen as to whether recitals in deeds between third parties, recitals of boundaries in the documents not inter partes, and judgment not inter partes would be admissible under this section.

The Patna High Court expressed the view that Section 11, has been expressed in very wide language, and, the questions of valuation, non-passing of consideration, absence of necessity for sale, and matters of such nature will certainly be relevant. The section however, does not admit of collateral facts which have practically no connection with the main fact. In considering only the sole question whether a deed has been executed within the meaning of Section 35, the Registration Act, questions like valuation, absence of necessity for sale, etc. cannot be relevant under Section 11 of the Evidence Act. It would appear that such questions do not come within the first part of the section, as they cannot be said to be truly inconsistent with the fact in issue, which is the proof of execution of the document within the meaning of Sections. 35 and 77 of the Registration Act. In a suit properly framed, but not under Section 77 of the Registration Act, such facts will be admissible under the second part of Section 11 as the question of validity of the document and the effect of the execution will be the fact in issue. For an enquiry in a suit under Section 77 of the Registration Act, these collateral facts are not so mediate as to render the issue of mere execution highly probable or improbable.[38]

JUSTICE CHANDRAVARKAR in Khaver Sultan v. Rukha Sultan[39] held that, to make a collateral fact relevant and admissible under this section, two requirements of law have to be fulfilled:—firstly, the collateral fact must itself be established by reasonable conclusive evidence and, secondly, when established, it must afford a reasonable presumption or an inference as to the matter in dispute. This view was later affirmed in.[40]

Thus, where the question in issue was whether possession was duly given of certain immovable properties under a deed of gift, so as to make it complete and valid under the Muhammadan Law, it was held that, if the deed of gift must be held to have operated effectually as to immovable property, the fact of this partial delivery, being a collateral fact fulfilling all the requirements of the law, was relevant under this section as making the existence of the facts in issue highly probable.[41]

The admissibility under this section in each case depends on how near is the connection of the facts sought to be proved with the facts in issue, to what degree do they render facts in issue probable or improbable when taken with other facts in the case, and to what extent would the admission of the evidence be inconsistent with principles enunciated elsewhere in this Act.[42] Where the accused was charged with having entered into a conspiracy to bring false evidence against a certain person, his previous acts of having instituted unfounded prosecution against that person are admissible in evidence. (Ibid.).

The expression 'fact' and a statement as to its existence, are different. This section deals with the admissibility of the existence of facts and not the statements as to its existence. If statements are to be admissible, the fact of making that statement must in itself be a matter in issue.[43]

Evidence recorded by one forum cannot be read in relation to the proceedings emanating from the other forum.[44]

Section 11 and Section 32.—There is difference of opinion between different High Courts in regard to whether Section 11 is subject to Section 32. One view is that this section is subject to the other provisions of the Act, and that any statement not satisfying the requirements of Sections 32 and 33 cannot be admitted simply on the ground that such statement may render highly probable or improbable a fact in issue or relevant fact. VARADHACHARIAR J. in Sevugan Chetiyar v. Raghunatha Doraisingam[45] observed: 'as regards Section 11, it seems to us that Section 11 must be read subject to the other provisions of the Act, and a statement not satisfying the conditions laid down in Section 32 cannot be admitted merely on the ground that, if admitted, it may probabilise or improbabilise a fact in issue or a relevant fact.

The same view was held in Belarani v. Mahabir[46]; Naima Khatun v. Basant Singh[47]; Bhogal Paswan v. Bibi Mabihan[48] and Kamla Devi v. Rodreshwar Prasad Singh[49]. In Bhogal Paswan v. Bibi Mabihan, rent receipt in respect of the suit lands granted by a landlord to the plaintiff, describing the plaintiff as the daughter of the tenant, was held not admissible under Section 32 of the Act as the landlord was still alive and there was no explanation on behalf of the plaintiff for his non-examination and the statement in the receipt as to the relationship of the plaintiff with the deceased tenant not being admissible under Section 32, cannot be relevant under Section 11.

The Assam High Court is also of the same view. Where a single note was made by a deceased in a diary, the question was whether that statement in the diary was admissible under Section 11. It was held that a statement made by a deceased person, to be relevant under Section 32(2), has to be one made 'in the course of ordinary business'; that Section 32(2) indicates a routine of business which is usually followed by the person whose declaration is sought to be proved, and it does not apply to any particular transaction of an exceptional kind and a solitary note in a diary by a deceased, which it is not possible to ascertain why and when it was made, cannot in the circumstances be said to be one made by the deceased in the normal routine and Section 32 is not applicable. Section 11 is controlled by Section 32 of the Act when the evidence consists of a statement of a person who is dead.[50]

On the other hand, it was observed in State v. Jagdeo[51]. "If a fact is relevant under Section 32, it can be proved notwithstanding that it is not relevant under Section 11, and to say that a fact relevant under Section 11 cannot be proved unless it is covered by the provisions of Section 32, is nothing short of striking out Section 11 from the Evidence Act. When Section 32 itself is sufficient to allow a fact to be proved, it would have been futile for the legislature to enact Section 11 if a fact made relevant by that section could not be proved unless it was also relevant under Section 32."

The same view was expressed by the Mysore High Court in the following terms: "Recitals in a document not inter partes are not 'facts' as mentioned in Section 11, unless the existence of those recitals is itself a matter in issue. Sections 11 and 32 cover different fields and there is no question of any overlapping, if properly construed. In brief, Section 11 deals with 'facts' while Section 32 deals with 'statements'. Section 32 is an exception to the rule of hearsay and it is proper to read Section 11 as an exception to Section 32. The several sub-sections of Section 32, in a measure, take in portion of a few other provisions contained in the Evidence Act. This is indicative of the fact that Section 32 exhaustively deals with law relating to relevancy of statements made by persons mentioned therein.[52]

In Kalappa Siddappa v. Bhimagovind,[53] it was stated that the recitals in a document not inter partes are not 'facts' within the meaning of that word in Section 11, that Sections 11 and 32 deal with different fields, as was pointed out in State v. Jagdeo[54]. They quoted with approval the observations in that case.

There is yet another view. The rule that Section 11 is controlled by Section 32 where the evidence consists of the statements of persons who are dead or cannot be found is subject to certain exceptions. It is admissible under Section 11 when it is altogether immaterial whether what a dead man said was true or false, but highly material that he did say it. In these circumstances, no amount of cross-examination could alter the fact, if it be a fact, that he did say the thing, and if nothing more is needed to bring the things said under Section 11, then the case is outside Section 32. There is a difference between the existence of fact and a statement as to its existence. Section 11 makes admissible the existence of facts, and not statements as to such existence, unless the fact of making that statement is in itself a matter in issue."[55]

2. CLAUSE (1) "IF THEY ARE INCONSISTENT WITH ANY FACT IN ISSUE OR RELEVANT FACT"

The importance of this clause that it gives a party an opportunity to disprove some fact, which is asserted by the opposite party. The principle of essential inconsistency is underlined in this clause. The usual theory of essential inconsistency is that a certain fact cannot co-exist with the doing of the act in question, and, therefore, if that fact is true of a person of whom the act is alleged, it is impossible that he should have done the act. Wigmore, in his Evidence (2nd Ed., Section 132, Vol.1) observes: "The usual theory of essential inconsistency is that a certain fact cannot co-exist with the doing of the fact in question, and, therefore, if that fact is true of a person of whom the act is alleged, it is impossible that he should have done the act..... The inconsistency, to be conclusive in proof, must be essential, i.e., absolute and universal, but since in offering evidence, we are not required to furnish demonstration but only fair ground for inference, the fact offered need not have this essential or absolute inconsistency, but merely a probable or presumable inconsistency; and its evidentiary strength will increase with this approach to absolute or essential inconsistency."

Where the question was whether a particular deed was executed within the meaning of Section 13 of the Registration Act, it was held that the questions like valuation and absence of necessity for sale cannot be relevant under this section, as such questions do not come within the first clause of the section and as they cannot be said to be inconsistent with the fact in issue, which under Sections 35 and 77 of the Registration Act is only the execution of the document.[56]

Even where a deed of relinquishment could not be admitted for want of registration under Section 17B, read with Section 49 of the Registration Act, it was held that it was relevant and admissible under this section, if the deed was inconsistent with the fact in issue in the case.[57]

According to WIGMORE, the facts which would normally fall under this section are of five common cases, though there may be some more conceivable cases.

(1) The absence of the person charged at the place of occurrence (alibi);

(2) The absence of a husband (non-access)—a variety of the preceding;

(3) The survival of an alleged deceased person after the supposed time of death;

(4) The doing of a crime by a third person; and

(5) The self-infliction of the harm alleged (see Wigmore Section 136-144, 2nd Ed).

If an object is secreted by the accused and recovered from his conscious possession and is found to be an incriminating object, it is relevant under Section 8 or Section 11(2).

Mere physical presence of the accused in proximity or in close proximity to the object cannot by itself be an incriminating circumstances unless it can be held that he was in conscious and intelligent possession of that object. Merely because he is the head of the joint family, or the owner of the house, he cannot be credited with constructive knowledge of a hidden thing. There would be no possession when there is no knowledge. Possession without knowledge lacks the element of mens rea or criminal intent which is essential for an offence.[58]

It was held: "A person cannot be said to be in possession of an article which he or she does not realise is or may be in her handbag, in her room or in some other place, over which she had control."[59]

3. ALIBI

Meaning of.—The plea of Alibi postulates the physical impossibility of the presence of the accused at the scene of offence by reason of his presence at another place. The plea can, therefore, succeed only if it is shown that the accused was so far away at the relevant time that he could not be present at the place where the crime was committed[60]; distance thus would be a material factor in the matter of acceptability of the plea of alibi and the distance of 400-500 yards between the place of occurrence and the place where the accused claimed to be present cannot be said to be 'present elsewhere'.[61] Alibi is based on the theory that the fact of presence elsewhere is essentially inconsistent with the presence of the accused at the place and time of the alleged occurrence, and the participation in it.

Where the accused handed over his diary to the police and claimed that certain entries establish his presence at a different place on the night in question, it is relevant under illus. (e) of Section 8 read with this section.[62]

4. ALIBI—APPLIES TO CIVIL CASES ALSO

WIGMORE (Vol. 1, Section 136, p. 570) states that the argument of alibi is not confined to criminal acts but may be equally applied to the disproof of civil acts, such as the execution of a deed.

5. PLEA OF ALIBI IS TO BE TAKEN UP AT A VERY EARLY STAGE

In Sahdeo Shham v. State of Vindhya Pradesh[63]; it was held that a request to call the witness to prove alibi at the very end of the trial would appear to be vexatious and dilatory, unless the possibility of making such a request has been indicated at the earlier stages. A defence of alibi, if true, is to be raised at the earliest moment.[64]

6. PROOF OF ALIBI

Strict proof is required to prove the plea of alibi and the burden was on the accused. In the instant case, strict proof of impossibility of the presence of the accused at the place of occurrence was not available and hence the plea was not sustainable.[65]

Where a plea of alibi is set up and it utterly breaks down, it is a strong inference that, if the prisoner was not in fact where he says he was, then in all probability, he was where the prosecution says he was.[66]

The plea of alibi must be proved with absolute certainity, so as to completely exclude the possibility of the presence of the person concerned at the place of occurrence.[67] Where there was no contemporaneous document was produced to prove the plea of alibi, it was not accepted.[68] In a case Supreme Court observed that absence from the factory did not mean absence from the place of crime, the same being nearby.[69]

The Allahabad High Court held that if the evidence by the accused in respect of his plea of alibi creates a reasonable doubt about the genesis of the occurrence, it would be sufficient to give benefit of doubt to the accused.[70]

WIGMORE observes: "The defendant's case is often much weakened by an unsuccessful attempt to prove an 'alibi'. But this result happens, not because of any implied or technical admission involved in the attempt but because of fraud and subornation of perjury manifested in the attempt..... In no case can the attempt be held to involve an admission of crime, nor the simple failure to establish it afford any presumption of the defendant's presence at the time and place when and where the crime was committed..... It can have no effect upon the question of his presence at the place charged, otherwise than by disclosing falsehood and prevarication and thus affording general evidence of guilt."[71]

The prosecution case cannot be said to have been proved against a particular accused, merely because the accused came out with a plea of alibi, the evidence in support of which was found to be untrustworthy.[72]

A fool-proof alibi is no doubt the most effective answer to a charge. A false plea of alibi is very dangerous, the result of which is like a bubble if successfully picked rebounds on him who has taken it, which while smashing his defence, strengthens the prosecution.[73]

For the purpose of arriving at the conclusion that the plea of alibi has been established, not only the defence evidence in support of the plea but also the prosecution evidence should be examined. The accused has to prove the plea of alibi under Section 103 of this Act, and it is not for the prosecution to prove that the accused was absent from duty on the date of occurrence.[74]

The plea of alibi must cover the whole time of the transaction or atleast so much period as to render the presence of the accused improbable at the time of the crime.[75]

The Privy Council, in Bhuboni Sahu v. The King,[76] observed: "The tendency to include the innocent with the guilty is peculiarly prevalent in India, as judges have noted on innumerable occasions, and it is very difficult for the court to guard against the danger. An Indian villager is seldom in a position to place cogent evidence of alibi. If he is charged with having taken part in a crime on a particular night when he was in fact asleep in his hut, or guarding his crops, he can only rely, as a rule, on the evidence of his wife, members of his family, or friends to support his story, and their evidence is interested and not likely to carry weight. The only real safeguard against the risk of condemning the innocent with the guilty lies in insisting upon independent evidence which in some measure implicates each accused."[77]

7. APPRECIATION OF EVIDENCE IN RESPECT OF ALIBI

Where the accused pleads, that he was away from the house when the offence was committed and the evidence to the contrary was proved, it was held that the alibi failed[78] and the Court would be slow to believe any counter evidence.[79]

Where the eye-witness evidence was corroborated by other witnesses in respect of the fact that the accused immediately after the incident was absconding from the village, the plea of alibi that the accused had gone to another city cannot be accepted.[80] The uncorroborated oral evidence of alibi given by one witness cannot be relied upon, specially when the witness gives no reason for being able to remember the exact dates on which the accused is alleged to have come to the village of the witness, and to have left it.[81]

It was held by the Allahabad High Court, that, if the alibi evidence be good and no weakness is detected by the court in it, it should not be given the go by. If the court comes to know of no weakness in the prosecution evidence, the two cannot be true and the weakness must be found somewhere, however difficult it might be. If the court fails to find any weakness in either, the benefit of such failure must go to the accused and not to the prosecution, because a well-established alibi must be sufficient to show that the prosecution witnesses were not speaking the truth, or atleast to throw doubt upon their truthfulness. When a defence of alibi is set up and that defence utterly breaks down, it is a strong inference that, if the prisoner was not in fact where he says he was, then in all probability he was where the prosecution says he was. Moreover, such inference is to be drawn only when the defence of alibi breaks down and not when it is disbelieved.[82]

The evidence of a highly interested witness supporting the plea of alibi is liable to be rejected.[83] In a case, two out of the three accused set up the plea of alibi; where the victim received as many as 19 injuries, it was held that the number of injuries suggested that they were caused by more than one miscreant and the defence of alibi was not tenable.[84] Where the accused claimed to be out of the house seeing a cinema show at the time of murder, in view of the evidence of the witness who stated that he heard shouts of the daughter of the accused that her father was beating her mother, it was held that the plea of alibi was not proved.[85] Where the accused pleaded that he was hospitalised on the date of occurrence, and the nurse who made the entries in the hospital's indoor register was not examined, it was held that the plea failed[86] but where the accused was discharged from a hospital situated 180 kms. away from the place of occurrence one a half hours earlier only from the time of incident, the plea of alibi was proved.[87]

8. PLEA OF ALIBI—PLEA OF SELF-DEFENCE

If there is sufficient material on record to show that the accused acted in his right of private defence of property, he cannot be deprived of the benefit of the plea of self-defence, even though he tries to set up the plea of alibi in vain and pleads the right of private defence in the alternative.[88]

9. COMMISSION OF CRIME BY THIRD PERSON

If X is charged with homicide, committed by him alone, and it is shown in disproof that Y did the killing, X is clearly exonerated; for the fact that Y has done it, it is inconsistent with X's guilt.[89]

10. SECTION 11(2)

The facts which make the existence or non-existence of a fact in issue, or relevant facts, highly probable or improbable, are made relevant by this clause.

11. "HIGHLY PROBABLE OR IMPROBABLE"

These words have got a significant role while deciding whether a fact, which makes the existence or non-existence of the fact in issue or relevant fact, is relevant in a particular case. It indicates that the connection between the facts in issue and the collateral facts which are sought to be proved, must be immediate so as to render the existence or non-existence of the two highly probable or improbable.[90] The expression 'highly probable' is important and the facts to be proved must be so closely connected with the facts in issue, that the court will not be in a position to determine it without taking them into consideration.[91] In Babulal Chonkhani v. Western India Theaters Ltd.,[92] it was observed that the words are not 'reasonably probable'. The word is not just 'probable', th significant word is 'highly'; that means more than normal standard of probability. The illustration, although not controlling this section, indicates clearly what is the standard of high probability or high improbability. The words 'highly probable' in clause (2) of Section 11 are of great importance. Only such facts are made admissible by this clause as would carry great weight with the court in reaching a conclusion either way, with regard to existence or non-existence of a fact in issue or relevant fact. It is not mere reasonable probability that is contemplated; on the other hand, a high degree thereof is envisaged.[93]

Where one of the facts in issue was possession of a revolver, the fact that three weeks previously, the accused displayed a revolver similar in size and appearance to that with the possession of which he was charged, was held relevant under this section.[94] In a suit for recovery of possession of a plot and declaration of title, the defendants denied the existence of the plot in question or possession of the plaintiff; but its existence and possession of the plaintiff over it was acknowledged in a sale deed of the adjacent plot and hence the same was held admissible in view of Sections 13(a) and 11.[95] Where the police alleged that the accused A was arrested on 29-9-1973, and the co-accused B, apprehending his arrest, filed an application during investigation, showing that A was arrested on 27-9-1973, it was held that the application of B could be considered as part of B's statement under Section 342, Cr. P.C. (old), as it would make the arrest of A on 29-9-1973, highly improbable.[96]

Where a complainant, a printer at Bareilly claimed copyright of printing a certain book and the infringement of it by printer at Hathras, the court trying the offence at Bareilly summoned the infringing copies of the book. It was held that "The complainant cannot be restricted to produce evidence only regarding sale of the copies at Bareilly when the relevant material evidencing the alleged infringement itself was available in the shape of recovery of the mass of the infringing copies at Hathras, which would have a direct bearing on the case cognizable at Bareilly. Even though the printing of the infringing copies at Hathras might be an offence in itself under the Copyright Act, yet if that is also material for the determination of the question regarding the sale of infringing copies at Bareilly, the production of infringing copies seized at Hathras would itself become relevant.[97]

In a suit for partition, there was an arbitration. In finding out the extent of the estate, the arbitrators excluded the deposits or investments made by others, because those were not assets but liabilities of the estate. They, however, showed the depositors and their sums in the schedule annexed to the award. But as the depositors were not parties to the partition suit, no direction as to the repayment of those deposits was made in the decree made on award. On refusal by the receivers to repay them, the depositors filed a suit on the basis of the award. On the question of its maintainability, it was held, that the award might not be an admission of the assets held by the executors; but the schedule of the award and the circumstances under which it was prepared made the existence of the claim of the plaintiff highly probable and as such, was relevant under Section 11(2) of the Evidence Act.[98] Even self-serving statements, where they make the relevant fact highly probable or improbable, are admissible.[99]

In a suit where the execution of a document was in question, questions like valuation, absence of necessity of sale, are held not relevant as they do not render the execution highly probable or improbable.[1] Where printed newspapers containing an account of some proceedings were found in the possession of the accused, it was held that those papers are evidence of the fact of the publication of such account in that paper, but they themselves are not evidence of the truth of the facts stated therein, unless in connection with the other facts, they make the existence or non-existence of the fact mentioned therein, 'highly probable or improbable'.[2]

Where the accused was charged under Section 401, IPC, a previous 25 years old judgment, convicting the accused for dacoity was held admissible, to show the criminal tendency and not the habit of the accused to show that the offence concerned was highly probable.[3] Where the question was whether a person was a tenant as on 1-3-1974 and the documents came into existence after 1-3-1974, it was held that they cannot be thrown out as totally irrelevant because it has to be seen on the facts of the case whether the fact in issue is highly probable or not.[4] A reference in a sale deed that the vendor was in affluent condition and that he was not in need of money is not relevant in considering the question whether consideration was paid, as such facts would not make highly probable or improbable the payment of consideration.[5] The rate for lands shown in the other documents, which are similarly situated to the land in question, would render highly probable the rate claimed and hence relevant.[6] Where the value of a land recently acquired was fixed by judicial determination or otherwise, it woud be relevant for fixing the price of the adjoining land which is now under acquisition.[7]

On a charge of forgery, evidence of possession by the accused of other documents suspected to be forged was held to be inadmissible.[8] Where the question was whether a person was a habitual cheat, the fact that he belonged to an organization formed for the purpose of habitually cheating in concert was held to be relevant, and it was open to the prosecution to prove against each person that the members of the gang did cheat.[9] But, in case of conspiracy to commit dacoity, facts showing that the object of the illegal association during a period of several months prior to the dacoity in question had been the commission of thefts and other discreditable acts were held inadmissible to prove the nature and character of the association.[10]

Evidence of plans or desire to commit suicide is admissible. In Commonwealth v. Trefethen[11], it was expained in the following terms: "The nature of the case proved by the Commonwealth was such that it was not impossible that she had committed suicide. If it could be shown that she actually had an intention to commit suicide, it would be more probable that she did in fact commit it than if she had no such intention..... It may be true that an unmarried woman pregnant with child, if she has an intention to commit suicide, does not always carry that intention into effect, although she has an opportunity; but it is impossible to say that the actual existence of such an intention does not tend to throw some light upon the cause of death of such a woman when found dead under circumstances not inconsistent with the theory of suicide.....If it could be shown that during the week before her death she had actually attempted to drown herself, and had been prevented from doing so, it seems manifest that this fact, according to the general experience of mankind, would have some tendency to show that she might have made a second attempt."

Where the dead body was not recovered but only the human skeleton, skull and some bones, but the accused showed the slippers and cycle used by the deceased, and some portions of wearing apparel, it was held that the act of the accused was relevant as the act, besides his extra-judicial confession, would make the prosecution case highly probable to show the guilt of the accused.[12]

12. OMISSION IN FIRST INFORMATION REPORT—AFFECTING PROBABILITIES

If there are omissions of important facts which constitute an important link of the prosecution story, and such omissions affect the probabilities of the case, they become relevant in judging the varacity of the prosecution case.[13] Where the FIR disclosed an offence of outraging the modesty of a woman and of use of abusive language, and the accused was charged with robbery, it was held that the omission in the FIR about the offence of robbery affected the veracity of prosecution case.[14] The delay in filing the F.I.R. gives rise to the improbability of the presence of the accused, and where the presence of the accused, a Government servant, at the place of occurrence was not proved, it was held that the accused was entitled to acquittal.[15]

Where the F.I.R. was lodged by a person other than the eye-witness which was not contradictory to the evidence of the eye-witness but there was merely an omission in the F.I.R. to specify overt acts of two accused persons separately, such a variance would not be a ground to reject the evidence of the eye-witness totally.[16]

Where the father of the boy who was murdered, gave the statement that the deceased boy told him the facts and that formed the first information report, and the evidence the version in the F.I.R. is found to be at great variance with the version placed at the trial, it was held that the omission of material facts affecting the probability of the case is relevant for judging the veracity of the prosecution case, and the prosecution story cannot be accepted.[17]

13. PREVIOUS JUDGMENTS

Where the question was whether the detenus were foreigners within the meaning of the Foreigners Act, and judgments delivered by Baroda State Courts holding that they are Baroda State subjects were relied on, it was held that Section 11 had no application, for, if a judgment is held to render highly probable or improbable what was found by it, no judgment would ever be rendered irrelevant, provided the subject matter is relevant to the subject matter in issue.[18] An order of rectification by a Civil Court, though not a judgment in rem is relevant in assessment proceedings before the I.T.O.[19]

14. JUDGMENT NOT INTER PARTES

Judgments not inter partes, even if not admissible under Sections 40, 41, 42 may be admissible under this section read with Section 43, under certain circumstances, for limited purposes.[20] property, it was held in the subsequent suit that the judgment in the previous suit was not admissible in evidence, the subject-matter in the two suits not being identical.[21]

Except where they are judgments in rem, or where they relate to public matters, judgments not inter partes have been always held to be not res judicata but they cannot be wholly excluded for other purposes, insofar as they explain the nature of possession, or throw light on the motives or conduct of parties, or identify property.[22] Judgments not inter partes in land acquisition references relating to another land are not admissible. Award in a land acquisition matter made by the land acquisition officer is only an offer and hence not admissible in another case.[23]

The claim order passed by a civil court, rejecting the claim of the accused, can be taken to show the falsity of the statement of the accused in a criminal case.[24]

15. DOCUMENTS RECITALS IN DOCUMENTS NOT INTER PARTES

A piece of land was sold in parts to two different buyers who were in dispute about their respective areas. Sale-deed earlier in time was preferred as showing the probable intention of the parties.[25]

Recitals as regards boundaries in document not inter partes are not admissible under this section. Two conditions must be satisfied before a statement is admissible under Section 32(3) of this Act:— firstly, it must be statement of a relevant fact and, secondly, it must be a statement against the proprietory interest of the person making it. It is also necessary that the person making the statement must be aware of the fact that it is against his interest.[26]

In a suit in which the plaintiff claims title to a land, the recital of the boundary of another land in a document between him and a third party, which describes him as the owner of the suit land, is not admissible.[27]

Recital in mortgage bond executed long before the suit, describing the mortgagor as the owner of the property under a partition, is admissible.[28] Where the plaintiffs and some of the defendants were co-owners of certain properties, the question at issue being whether there was a partition between them, and whether, under that partition, the defendants came to be in possession of a specific property in lieu of their share in all the properties, a petition and a written statement filed by the defendants in certain previous suits admitting the partition and the exclusive acquisition of the specific property were held admissible against those defandants as they made the existence of the partition, which was the fact in issue, highly probable. They were also admissible under Section 21(3).[29] Where the question whether the property in the suit was kept joint, inspite of partition, was a fact in issue, a document called as subdharana bond executed by the party in favour of third person reciting that there was a partition of the suit property was produced, to which the plaintiff was not a party; it was held that the recital, though not binding on the plaintiff, is relevant under this section.[30] Where the question in issue was whether B had predeceased K, a statement made by a party in his own favour in an objection petition filed in previous land registration proceedings, that B had predeceased K, was held admissible under this section.[31] Recital in a sale deed about the necessity for the sale is admissible, but some evidence aliunde is required to prove necessity.[32] Where in an election petition filed under the Representation of People Act, 1951,

In suits for damages, facts tending to enable Court to determine amount are relevant.

S. 12. In suits in which damages are claimed, any fact which will enable the Court to determine the amount of damages which ought to be awarded, is relevant.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

Section 5 states that evidence may be given of facts in issue or relevant facts, whereas Sections 6-11 deal with certain facts which are generally relevant to the facts in issue or relevant fact. This section deals with the fixation of damages and such of those facts as would enable the Court to determine the amount of damages. Section 73 of the Contract Act deals with the facts which are relevant for purpose of fixing the amount of compensation. Under this section, in a suit for damages, facts tending to 'determine' the amount of damages, which are to be awarded by the court only are relevant. Section 55 of this Act states that in civil cases the fact that the character of any person is such as to affect the amount of damages which he ought to receive is relevant. The explanation thereunder shows that in Sections 53, 54 and 55 the word 'character' includes both reputation and disposition. So, to cover cases under Section 73 of the Contract Act and Section 55 of this Act, this section becomes important.

This section enables the court to admit any facts which will help it to determine the amount of damages which ought to be awarded to a party. When damages are claimed in a suit, the amount of damages is a fact in issue. 'Damages' are the pecuniary satisfaction which the plaintiff may obtain by success in an action.

For the meaning of damages standard treatises on 'Damages' may be referred to.

This section prescribes the mode of using the former statements of a witness for the purpose of contradicting the him.[35]

2. HOW TO ASSESS

(1) The damage suffered should be as near as possible, to the sum which will put the injured party in the same position as he would have been if he had not sustained the wrong foi which he is awarded damages or compensation.

(2) Damages are usually assessed on the basis of actual loss suffered and are called general or ordinary damages.

(3) Where the plaintiff has not suffered any real damages by reason of breach of contract, normally, nominal damages are awarded.[36]

(4) Special damages can be awarded for personal inconvenience or physical dis-comfort caused by the other party. Where malice, fraud or defamation is involved, causing damage to the reputation of the individual, then exemplary damages can be awarded for the wrongful act of the defendant.

Thus there are four types of damages which the courts can grant.

Damages may be recovered either for breach of contract under Section 73 of the Contract Act, or for loss of goods under Sale of Goods Act, 1930, or in an action for tort.

In Thawardas Perumal v. Union of India,[37] it was held that the parties by express agreement, may vary their rights and obligations which may arise under the law. And if they do so, the express agreement will govern them.

Where defamatory statements imputing misconduct on the part of a man towards his step-daughter were the subject matter of a suit, and in defence truth was pleaded, evidence that the step-daughter herself had been spreading rumours that her step-father had been making improper advances to her, was held relevant under this section for assessing damages.[38]

The Supreme Court held that, for determining the amount payable as compensation, the evidence of a person who had made an offer for the purchase of that land is relevant to show that the land was of certain value.[39] In suits for compensation for short delivery by the railway authorities or for deterioration of the goods entrusted to the railways, it was held that the short delivery certificate or non-delivery certificate upon which the words 'without prejudice' are found, would not amount to admission of the liability, and proof of actual damages and the quantum of damages is necessary in such cases.[40]

Under this section it may be laid down generally that evidence tending to determine, i.e., to increase or diminish the damages, is admissible though not expressly involved in issue. Thus, in an action for breach of promise of marriage, the plaintiff may give evidence of the defendant's fortune; for it obviously tends to prove the loss sustained by the plaintiff; but not in an action for adultery; not for malicious prosecution. But the evidence of the amount of damages, which is the necessary and obvious result of the defendant's breach of contract, or of his tort, may be proved, though only alleged generally in the plaint.[41]

Facts relevant when right or custom is in question.

S. 13. Where the question is as to the existence of any right or custom, the following facts are relevant:—

(a) any transaction by which the right or custom in question was created, claimed, modified, recognized, asserted or denied, or which was inconsistent with its existence.

(b) particular instances in which the right or custom was claimed, recognized or exercised, or in which its exercise was disputed, asserted or departed from.

ILLUSTRATION

The question is, whether A has a right to a fishery. A deed conferring the fishery on A's ancestors, a mortgage of the fishery by A's father, a subsequent grant of the fishery by A's father, irreconcilable with the mortgage, particular instances in which A's father exercised the right, or in which the exercise of the right was stopped by A's neighbours, are relevant facts.

COMMENTS

1. PRINCIPLE AND SCOPE

This section provides that where the question is as to the existence of any right or custom, certain transactions or certain instances are relevant. A transaction to be relevant must be, one by which the right or custom in question was created, claimed, modified, recognised, asserted, or denied or which was inconsistent with its existence (vide Cl. (a)). Instances to be relevant, under Cl. (b) must be those in which the right or custom was claimed, recognised or exercised or in which its exercise was disputed, asserted or departed from. Facts which are not covered by Cls. (a) and (b) cannot be made relevant in view of Section 5, where it is stated that facts as are hereinafter declared to be relevant and of no others are relevant. Further only particular instances and not statements are relevant. The difference in wording in Cls. (a) & (b) may be noted. Cl. (a) speaks of a transaction by which the right or custom in question was created, modified etc., or which was inconsistent with its existence. But in Cl. (b) the three words created, modified, denied are not used as in Cl. (a). The words 'claimed', 'recognised' are common in both the clauses. Cl. (a) does not speak of the exercise of a right or custom.

The cases, this section is intended to meet, are those in which the right or custom in question is regarded as capable of surviving repeated instances of its assertion and denial, where transactions may be supposed to have gone on modifying, asserting, denying, creating, recognizing it, or being inconsistent with its existence, leaving it, after all that has been given in evidence, fair matter for judicial consideration as to whether the court should or should not decree it.[1]

2. APPLICABILITY

Originally it was thought that this section applies only to incorporeal rights[2] which was followed in Kalidhan Chuttapadhya v. Shibanath Chuttapadhya[3] and Ramkishun v. Niranjan Pande[4].

It was so held in Gujjulal's case on the ground that the right mentioned in the section is one which can be 'created or exercised' which expressions are appropriate when speaking of an incorporeal right; but would be wholly inapplicable to the word 'right' in its more extended sense; it would be quite correct to speak of the creation or the exercise of a right of way or of a franchise, but no lawyer would think of saying that a right to chattel or to damages had been 'created or exercised'. In the same case R.C. MITTER J., while dissenting from the majority view observed 'then it has been said that in Section 13 of the Evidence Act, the Legislature intended to refer to incorporeal right only because, in other parts of the Act, for example in Sections 32 and 48, where the same word occurs in conjunction with the word 'custom' it has been used in that sense. In the first place, it is by no means clear that Sections 32 and 48 deal with only incorporeal rights. It is not impossible to conceive of a corporeal right being of a public or general nature;..... Moreover, no reasonable ground can be suggested for the necessity of restricting the meaning of the word 'right' in Section 13 to the class 'incorporeal'..... But the contention that the section in question refers only to incorporeal rights, whether of a public or private nature, does not seem to me to be warranted by any general principle..... Why should the transaction of the nature described in Section 13 be relevant when A claims a right of way over a piece of land held and owned by B, and not so when he claims the land itself, appears to me inexplicable. It seems to me that the distinction would be arbitrary." Thus according to him Section 13 applies to both corporeal and incorporeal rights.

The dissenting view of JUSTICE MITTER, found favour in some cases.[5]

The judgment in a prior suit was held admissible as an instance in which there was an assertion that certain properties belong to joint family, in a subsequent suit in which those properties were claimed to be self acquired properties.[6] A judgment sought to be adduced in a pending suit cannot be refused as not receivable on the ground that it was rendered in a subsequently instituted suit. The use of past tense in Section 13(b) refers to the date of judgment and not the institution of the suit.[7]

The term "right" includes right of ownership. Where there is a dispute about adverse possession of land and oral evidence of owners of adjoining fields and sale deeds are produced to corroborate their evidence, it was held that the sale deeds are admissible as relevant and their admissibility is covered under Section 157.[8]

The term 'right' comprehends every right known to the law.[9]

The rights contemplated by this section are plainly conceived as admitting of proof by cumulative instances and transactions, and not by a single and decisive and final way, namely the terms of a document. The whole context indicates that the section is dealing with continuing rights which may be interrupted without being necessarily destroyed.

The section is not confined to public rights but covers private rights also, e.g., see the illustration to the section. The way in which a property and its income has been treated has been held relevant to consider whether it is secular or religious.[10]

Right to perform Kali Puja can be proved by showing that it was reasonable, ancient, and exercised openly and peaceably. It is not necessary to prove exercise of the right since time immemorial.[11] Previous judicial determination of the basis of valuation of land can be cited in a subsequent acquisition matter.[12]

Section 13 makes relevant only certain transactions and instances for the purpose of establishing the existence of any right or custom. Determination of relationship of persons as father and son is neither a question of any right nor custom.[13]

3. CUSTOM

A custom is a rule which in a particular family or in a particular district, has from long usage obtained the force of law.[14]

4. CUSTOM AND LAW—GENERAL AND STATUTORY

As custom is 'transcendent law' according to the usages it is open to establish a custom modifying the ordinary Hindu Law i.e. a custom having the force of law.[15] A custom has the effect of making a variation in the general law prevailing at the time when such custom comes to be recognised.[16] Clear proof of usage or custom outweighs the written text of law.[17] A custom as stated earlier has got the effect to vary the general law prevailing at the time when such custom comes to be recognised. For depriving a party of his rights under the general law the custom must either expressely exclude him from that right or the intention to exclude must necessarily follow by implication of the proved custom.[18]

Zamindar's customary right of 'Zari Chaharam' in U.P., to recover a fourth of the sale consideration of a house sold by 'Riyaya' is not affected by the Transfer of Property Act since it is saved by Section 2(c) of T.P. Act.[19]

Custom affecting the fundamental rights under the Constitution are void.[20]

It should not derogate from any statute unless the statute saves any such custom or generally makes exception in favour of the rule of the custom.[21]

5. REQUISITES OF A VALID CUSTOM

A custom to be recognized by a court should be:

(1) ancient

(2) continuous and uniform

(3) reasonable

(4) certain

(5) compulsory and not optional

(6) peaceable, and

(7) not immoral.

(a) ancient

A period of 200 years is quite sufficient for the development of a family custom for exclusion of daughters from inheritance and it cannot be rejected as not immemorial.[23] It was held in a case where there was proof that for about 50 years the land was being used by the defendant families exclusively for burying their dead, that fact is conclusive circumstances against the land being a public wakf.[24]

(b) reasonable and certain

Under the custom of Dhar Dhura a deep stream or a channel of a river is regarded as the constant boundary between two or more villages, irrespective of its changes in course. Prevention of quarrels and disputes between contiguous villages and estates is certainly an object beneficial to the community and judged by this test, the custom of Dhar Dhura cannot be held to be unreasonable.[25]

When there is a so-called custom in a village, depriving kamins of their manure which they required for cultivation of their lands obtained on lease or by selling which they can make money, it was held that such custom is unreasonable as the custom cast no corresponding obligation or liability upon the land holder.[26] Where a custom was claimed, claiming a right to scavenge and to mortgage or sell such a right, it was held that such custom cannot be recognised as it is unreasonable.[27] Where in a rent suit the defence was that under an alleged custom no rent is payable in respect of lands during years of inundation irrespect of the extent of land inundated or of the crops destroyed, it was held that the custom was both unreasonable and uncertain and so invalid in law.[28]

There is nothing unfair or dishonest or contrary to the public good in a custom pleaded by tenants to act and appropriate their lien on their holdings and it is not unreasonable.[29] Where a custom is upheld by courts it would be an example of a reasonable custom. A custom can be said to be void for being unreasonable, when the unreasonable character conclusively proves that the usage, even though it may have existed from the time immemorial must have resulted from accident or indulgence and not from any right conferred in ancient times. A custom that a religious office is inalienable, cannot be said to be against public policy as customs in general involve some inconsistency with the general common law.[30]

If a custom was reasonable at its inception, it continues to be valid, though subsequently it may become onerous. Where a particular tree was situated on another's land and people used to offer puja to that tree according to their custom, merely because that tree threatened the safety of a house which was built long after the custom had established, it was held that the owner of the house cannot be allowed to cut the tree.[31]

The period for ascertaining whether a custom is reasonable or not is the period from its inception.[32]

Instances which take place subsequent to the controversy regarding any custom in any particular case are held to be admissible and it should be shown that the custom which is alleged to have existed before was still in continuance and that there is no variation.[33]

When there is evidence that all the members of the public are entitled to use a pathway and not merely residents of the village, it was held that the custom is not proved to be certain.[34]

(c) Opposed to Morality and Public Policy

A custom must not be opposed to morality or public policy or forbidden by law.[35]

Where a custom of potters' community in Tirunelveli district in Tamilnadu that a marriage can be dissolved by one paying to other the expenses of that marriage, which was shown to be ancient was held to be not immoral as it did not ignore the marriage as a legal institution.[36]

36. Shankarlingham Setti v. Subhan Shetti, 17 Mad 479.

No immoral custom or usage however, much practised can be upheld by a court. The Madras High Court in Deivanayaga Padayachi v. Muthu Reddy[37], held that the test of immorality must be determined by the sense of the community as a whole and not by the sense of a section of the people.

A custom which is abhorrent to dencency or morality though long practised and recognised by a particular community cannot be enforced by a court. A custom which is contrary to the sacred writings or which is immoral cannot be upheld.[38]

Any practice which tends to promote prostitution would be contrary to the policy of law e.g., Mahomadan Kanchans practising as a custom tending to prostitution as a family business.[39]

A custom must not be contrary to justice, equity, or good conscience.[40]

6. FORMS OF CUSTOM

Custom may be (a) family custom, (b) local custom, (c) general custom and (d) special custom.

(a) Family custom.—It must be ancient, certain, reasonable and invariable.[41]

Where there was a plea that Kanikkara Tribe in Kerala is governed by Marumakkathayam law and not by family custom it was held that the court cannot come to a conclusion that the family in question is governed by Marumakkathyam law merely because it was proved that there was no uniform customary law among that tribe.[42]

Difference between custom and usage of a family.—Custom carries with it idea of great antiquity and its observance by successive generations from its origin, whereas, for a family usage no such antiquity is necessary and it may be of recent origin and may be proved to be valid.[43]

In Ramalakshmiammal v. Sivanahtha Perummal,[44]; the Judicial Committee held that it is the essence of special usuage modifying the ordinary law of succession that it should be ancient and invariable: that it should be established by clear and unambiguous evidence.[45]

Where it was alleged there was a custom of devolution in an impartible estate by primogeniture and there was usage of the family to treat the movables as impartibles, after the abolition of Zamindari estate it was held by the Supreme Court that special usage modifying the general law must be established by clear and unambiguous evidence.[46]

When the family custom is in derogation of rules of law it must be construed strictly.[47]

Proof of family custom.—The burden of proving a custom in derogation of the general law being heavily on the party who sets it up, it is incumbent on him to prove by clear and cogent evidence that there is a family custom excluding females from taking as heirs. A statement as to custom from a person of the age of twenty two cannot command much weight.[48]

A family custom which is in derogation of the ordinary law in force in a territory where the parties reside, cannot be taken as proved by four instances of that custom of comparatively modern day.[49]

Where a family is of a comparatively recent origin immemorial usuage need not be proved in the case of a family custom. In fact the evidence regarding the existence of a family custom need not and cannot go beyond the time when the family is founded.[50]

The rule of succession by lineal primogeniture which may be a family custom or kulachar may be proved by oral evidence or by some decrees relating to dispute belonging to the same group of families.[51]

Person setting up a special custom must prove it.[52]

Where family custom of primogeniture was set-up, such custom has to be pleaded and proved.[53] When such custom is set up the evidence must be cogent, unimpeachable and such custom must be an ancient one. Where there are three branches of a same family and in two families that custom was prevailing, the members of the third branch cannot rely on such customs unless proved by cogent evidence. It is difficult to expect direct testimony of persons living at the time of the dispute, but witnesses who may otherwise be competent to speak either about the inheritance or the custom governing the succession to the property must be able to say that they heard about the custom from his ancestors during conversation with them.[54] Where the rule of primogeniture is found to prevail in several families all descending from a common ancestor at a particular place, it gives rise to a probability that such custom was prevalent in the family in question as well in that area.[55]

In Mahanth Bhagwan Bhagat v. Girija Namdam Bhagat[56] the Supreme Court held that the succession to Mahantship in that case was not based solely on seniority, but, ability, efficiency in management, moral character, spirit of service etc., all entered into consideration in the selection of a successor. A custom regarding succession to the properties of a Muth may be proved by showing instances in which a custom has been recognised or by showing a clear distinct and positive tradition in the Muth. On the facts it was held that the office of Mahantship of the Non-Garh Muth is not hereditary and there is a custom or usage of election.[57] A mere will of the last Mahant of an institution is not enough to entitle the plaintiff to succeed in the absence of proof of any custom of the particular institution sanctioning the devolution of the office by mere appointment or nomination by will of the last Mahant.[58]

PATANJALI SHASTRI J., in Thangavelu v. Court of Wards,[59] observed as to the custom recognising the claim to maintenance by the son of a proprietor of a Zamindar:—"The sons of a deceased Zamindar are entitled to maintenance out of the impartible estate in the hands of his successor without proof of special custom. The illegitimate son of a Sudra has been held to be a member of his putative father's family and to have status of a son for purposes of maintenance. His right to receive maintenance out of the father's impartible estate was recognised and given effect to as well established by judicial precedents as long ago as 1870. In these circumstances we consider that no proof of special custom is necessary to entitle the appellants to maintenance out of the Zamindari in the hands of the respondents 1 and 2."

When a custom is so well recognised by courts it can be taken as engrafted in the general law.[60]

(b) Local Custom.—A custom observed in a particular district derives its force from the fact that it has, from long usuage, obtained in that district the force of law. It must be ancient, but it is not of the essence of this rule that its antiquity must in every case be carried back to a period beyond the memory of man. It will depend upon the circumstances of each case what antiquity must be established before the custom can be accepted. What is necessary to be proved is that the usage has been acted upon in practice for such a long period and with such invariability as to show that it has, by common consent, been submitted to as the established governing rule of the particular district.[61]

(c) General Custom.—In English Law a distinction was made between a general custom and public custom. Where the word 'public' is used the custom is common to all e.g:—Public Highway. General custom refers to right which is common to the inhabitants of one or more parishes.

The Evidence Act does not make any such distinction regarding the admissibility of relevant facts, under this section.

The Jains and Marwaris are different sects of Hindus though in various religious practice and beliefs they do not agree with the orthodox Hindu System. Except with regard to the Marwaris of Madras and the Punjab, the other Marwaris who migrated from Jaipur, Jodhpur and Bikaner are governed by the same custom.[62]

The word 'general custom' is used in Section 48 of this Act and includes public custom. And that expression is explained in Section 48 stating it includes customs or rights common to any considerable class of persons. The word 'includes' is used to bring in local custom, caste or class custom, trade custom or usage.

General custom may be varied by Special Custom.[63]

Regarding a custom among non-regenerate castes in Telengana area it was held that there is no basis to hold that they had the custom of performing rites sanctioned by local custom and not of rites sanctioned by the Smritis under the ordinary law.[64]

(d) Special Custom.—In this category private or local customs can be taken to fall. Such customs are confined to a particular class of people or to particular families in respect of family trade, inheritance or observance of local custom like performing puja to a particular deity in a particular village. It was observed by the Privy Council "Their Lordships cannot find any principle or authority for holding that in point of law a manner of descent of an ordinary estate depending solely on family usage may not be discontinued, so as to let in the ordinary law of succession. Such family usages are in their nature different from a territorial custom which is the lex loci binding all persons within the local limits in which it prevails. It is of the essence of family usages that they should be certain, invariable and continuous, and well-established. If discontinuance has arisen from accidental causes, the effect cannot be less, when it has been intentionally brought about by the concurrent will of the family.[65]

Among Kashi Vellalas in Travancore, there is a custom to the effect that daughters are not entitled to share in the father's estate.[66]

Trade Custom.—To prove a trade usage it has to be shown that it is consistent and reasonable, and it was acknowledged by the class of traders.[67]

There is a well-known practice among Nattukottai Chetties to draw hoondies, bills and promisory notes in favour of the agents with the 'Vilasam' (address) of the firm. In all those cases the firm is the real payee.[68]

7. PROOF OF CUSTOM

In order to prove a custom:—

The evidence should be such as to prove uniformity and continuity of the usage and the conviction of those following it that they were acting in accordance with law, and this conviction must be inferred from the evidence. Oral evidence of witnesses who depose to having heard of the customs from their deceased ancestors is admissible.[69]

The evidence of act of the kind, acquiescence in those acts, their publicity, decisions of Courts, or even of Panchayats upholding such acts, the statements of experience and competent persons of their belief that such acts were legal and valid will all be admissible, but it is obvious that, although admissible, evidence of this latter kind will be of little weight if unsupported by actual examples of the usage asserted.[70]

It is incumbent on a party setting up a custom to allege and prove the custom on which he relies and it is not any theory of custom or deductions from other customs which can be made a rule of decision but only any custom applicable to the parties concerned that can be the rule of decision in a particular case. Custom cannot be extended by analogy and it cannot be established by a priori methods.[71]

The rule of custom should prevail in all cases and if any aberrations have to be corrected, such correction must take the course in the direction of re-establishing the rule of custom.[72]

A trade usage or custom may be proved in the same way as a family custom, except that it is unnecessary to show that such a custom is either ancient or continuous. A trade usage may be still in course of growth; it may require evidence of its support in each case; but in the result it is enough if it appears to be so well-known and acquiesced in, that it may be reasonably presumed to have been an ingredient tacitly imported by the parties into their contract.[73]

A right of pre-emption was set up by Hindus on the basis of custom, on the same lines as by Muslims which was recognised judicially by long course of decisions. In such a case it was held it was not necessary for the Hindus to prove the custom by further evidence.[74]

The burden of proving a custom is on the person who asserts it.[75]

Where there is a custom in derogation of law, the burden rests on the person who sets up the custom and wishes to be governed by it.[76]

When a custom is pleaded it must be precise in terms and has to be established by evidence.[77]

It was held that the mere fact that daughters were excluded from inheritance without any dispute being raised or any claim being preferred was not sufficient to prove the existence of a custom that daughters were not entitled to inheritance. In view of the very short period from which the succession in the family of the parties opened, it could not be said that a custom was acted upon for a long time so as to outweigh the personal law, a custom must be ancient and not immoral. It must be invariable, certain and continuous and the burden to prove custom in derogation of personal law is on the party who alleges it.[78]

General custom may be proved:—

(1) by the opinion of persons having special means of knowledge thereof or likely to know of its existence.

(2) by statements of persons who are dead provided they were made before any controversy as to such custom arose.

(3) by any transaction where it was claimed, modified, recognised.

(4) by particular instances where it was claimed, recognised, exercised.[79]

The proof of invariability of the custom lies on the person/plaintiff who sets up the custom. To hold that the instances given by the defendants are not sufficient to prove the custom in opposition thereof is to propound a proposition which evidently ignores the principle that the proof of these instances destroyed the very essential feature of a valid custom, namely its invariability.[80]

Answers given in Wilson's Manual on questions of Customs in Punjab are admissible to prove the Customs there.[81]

Aboriginal Santhals in the village Kutcheri by custom have become sufficiently Hinduised and they are governed by Hindu Law. The burden to prove the custom is on the party who sets up otherwise.[82]

Where Hindus objected to the exercise of a right of Mahamadans to kill cows on festival occasions basing on their ecclesiastical law as the basis of a local custom, it was held that the burden is on the Hindus to prove that the Mahamadans have lost their legal or ecclesiastical right by which owes reason of a custom its origin to common consent and voluntary forbearance on the part of the Mahamadans.[83]

8. WHEN COURTS RECOGNISE THE CUSTOM

Where the custom is well recognised by the courts, it would not be necessary for a person who sets up such custom to prove it.[84]

In Rajaramarao v. Raja of Pittapur,[85] it was observed by LORD DUNEDIN "When a custom or usage, whether in regard to a tenure or a contract or a family right, is repeatedly brought to the notice of the courts of a country, the courts may hold that custom or usage to be introduced into the law without the necessity of proof in each individual case. It becomes in the end truly a matter of process and pleading...".[86]

Where it was alleged that a family custom exists among the Abhan Thakurs of Oudh, in derogation of the ordinary Mitakshara Law in force there, that on the extinction of the line of one of the several brothers the descendants of all the other brothers take equally without reference to their nearness to common ancestors it was held by the Privy Council that by giving four instances it cannot be said that such custom is proved; as those four instances of custom were of comparatively modern date.[87]

Where the alleged custom was one prohibiting from doing an act which involves sacrilege to LORD JAGANATHA, it was held by the Orissa High Court that the general rule that where a customary right is alleged several instances of the assertion of the right and its due recognition should be proved, will not apply, as one cannot get innumerable instances in which such attempt was made and frustrated.[88]

Custom cannot be extended by analogy and it cannot be established by a priori methods. Oral evidence as to instances which can be proved by documentary evidence cannot safely be relied upon to establish custom, when no satisfactory explanation for withholding the best kind of evidence is given.[89]

9. CUSTOMARY RIGHT

This right is normally of a public nature in which public are interested. It is not necessary to prove any fixed period of enjoyment to establish a customary right. Where a customary right is set up and user for thirty years is proved the presumption would be prima facie that it was as of right and it is for the party who wants to show that it was only permissive to prove it.[90]

By its very definition, a customary right cannot be the creature of a written instrument.[91]

Where there was an order of the superintendent of a former State during the settlement operation recognising the right of the villagers of certain villages to graze their cattle in the disputed land, it was held that the order is relevant under this section for proving the customary right.[92]

It is not necessary to prove the customary right from time immemorial. If the right is reasonable and ancient and has been exercised openly and peaceably without interruption and not stealthily, such right assumes the character of a customary right and it can be enforced in a court of law.[93]

In a case where Muslims were immersing the Tazias in a particular tank at the time of Muharram festival period for 15 years, it was held by the Privy Council that such period was insufficient for a finding of customary right, on the ground that such practice should have begun by permission or agreement and it must be shown to have continued for such length of time that it has come to be exercised as of right.[94]

For a valid customary right of using a place for burial—it must be ancient, invariable, certain, continuous, peaceful and open enjoyment is necessary.[95] Where a family for over fifty years was using a particular land exclusively for burying their dead, it was held that it is a conclusive circumstance for holding it as a customary right.[96]

Where out of deference to the religious susceptibilities of the Hindus and in order to respect their feelings the Mahammadans knowingly and willingly desist from exercising their right to slaughter kine, it is only to maintain good social relations and neighbourly feelings between the two communities; a custom thus arising cannot be said to be unreasonable.[97]

If a right is claimed by virtue of a custom, all the essential characteristics of a custom bearing on it, have to be established. Thus it has to be seen, whether it has been proved that the right was certain and invariable, and that its enjoyment was not by leave or permission. Then it has to be seen whether the custom could be said to be reasonable and whether it has been in existence for a fairly long period of time. Sections 13, 32(4), 43 and 48 of the Evidence Act have a bearing on the mode of proving a customary right. In the case, the witnesses for the plaintiffs had stated that plaintiff's cattle used to rest in the disputed land while going to the grazing ground and returning there from. The evidence was held relevant but since the use of the land was found fugitive and permissible, it was held that the plaintiffs had failed to establish customary right.

It was further held that where the customary right claimed to use inhabited portion of the village as resting place for cattle, it is not reasonable and cannot be enforced.[98]

10. RIWAJ-I-AM

The entry in Riwaj-i-Am in support of special custom is an important piece of evidence of it and the burden of proof shifts on the party challenging it.[99] Where one finds entries relating to any custom the initial presumption must be in favour of the correctness of the entry in Riwaj-i-Am.[1] The Privy Council in Beg v. Allah Ditta,[2] held that the Riwaj-i-Am is a public record prepared by a public officer in discharge of the duties and under Government rules; that it is admissible in evidence to prove the entries therein subject to rebuttal and the statements therein may be accepted even if unsupported by instances.[3]

The Supreme Court held that the entries in Riwaj-i-Am of Jullunder district are unreliable and could not prove that there was no custom of divorce among Hindu Jats.[4] Where Riwaj-i-Am simply recites the general law no particular evidentiary value is attached to it. Most of the matters contained in it are not different from the rules of Hindu Law.[5]

See commentary on Section 35 and Section 48 under the head Riwaj-i-Am.

11. WAZIB-UL-ARZ

In Balgobind v. Badriprasad,[6] it was held that the record in Wazib-ul-Arz of custom is most valuable evidence of a custom, and is a much more reliable evidence than oral evidence which is given after the dispute as to the custom has arisen. Where it is prepared and attested according to law, it is prima facie evidence of existence of any custom. Unless rebutted by any one disputing such custom.[7] The Privy Council in Sheobaran Singh v. Kulsum-ul-nissa,[8] held that a statement in Wazib-ul-Arz of a village is a record of statements of persons relating to existing rights and customs and where a custom of pre-emption which is not in contravention of law is recorded it is prima facie evidence of such custom and it can be exercised without corroborative evidence of instances. It is not necessary in each case to give instances of the observance of the custom and the Wazib-ul-Arz might itself be sufficient to establish the custom, where the existence of a particular custom in a certain family is in question, other factors such as whether a similar custom prevails in the class to which the party belongs or among the caste generally, are of merely secondary importance as tending to make probable or improbable the existence of such a custom in that particular family.[9]

An amalnama patta in which a predecessor of a co-sharer makes a statement in derogation of his own interest is certainly admissible for the purpose of showing the existence of a perqunnah custom.[10]

See Commentary on Section 35 and Section 48 under this head.

12. TRANSACTION

A transaction, in the ordinary sense of the word, is some business or dealing which is carried on or transacted between two or more persons. Transaction is something which has been concluded between persons by a cross or reciprocal action and in the largest sense it means that which is done.[11]

According to STEPHEN in his digest "A transaction is a group of acts so connected together as to be referred to by a single legal name as a crime, contract, a wrong or any other subject of inquiry which may be in issue. Every fact which is part of the same transaction as the fact in issue, is deemed to be relevant to the facts in issue, although it may not be actually in issue and although if it were not part of the same transaction it might be excluded as hearsay. Whether any particular fact is or is not part of the same transaction, as the fact in issue, is a question of law upon which no principle has been stated by authority and on which single judges have given different decisions."

Sale deeds are evidence quantum valeant as transactions and instance in which rights are asserted and recognised and so admissible under Section 13.[12] In a suit for recovery of possession of a plot and for declaration of title, the defendants denied the existence of the plot in question or possession of the plaintiff, but its existence and possession of the plaintiff over it was acknowledged in a sale deed of the adjacent plot and hence the same was held admissible in view of Sections 13(a) and 11.[13]

Will.— The word 'transaction' is not confined to a dealing with property between two persons inter vivos but can, without any strain on the language, be taken to include testamentary dealing with the property. A statement, therefore, in a will that the property dealt with there under is the property of the testator is admissible under Section 13(a) and also under Section 32(7) as a relevant fact.[14]

A statement in a will executed by a deceased that certain properties was joint property of the three brothers was held to be admissible under Section 32(7) read with this section, as the deceased executant was a dis-interested person being a common aunt of the three brothers.[15]

Where the question of will was directly and substantially involved in a previous litigation and a finding was recorded by the courts about its due execution it was held that it is relevant and valuable piece of evidence under this section.[16]

It was held by the Patna High Court, that a litigation between two persons is a transaction.[17]

Written statements filed in a suit is not a transaction.[18] Where a widow filed a written statement claiming the land in a partition suit it was held it was not a transaction.

Gift-deed.—Recital of the gift-deed as old as that of 1945 as to the title of the property cannot be accepted. It has got to be decided on the basis of other evidence.[19]

13. JUDGMENT NOT INTER PARTES

Sections 40-42 and 43 deal with judgments and their relevancy. Section 40 deals with the existence of a judgment, order or decree which by law prevents any Court from taking cognizance of a suit or holding a trial. This principle we find in Section 11, C.P.C. as the principle of res judicata. For the application of that principle certain conditions have to fulfilled under Section 11, C.P.C. Section 41 deals with relevancy of a final judgment relating to probate, matrimonial, admiralty or insolvency jurisdiction. Such judgments are made relevant. Section 42, makes the judgment orders or decrees other than those mentioned in Section 41, relevant if they relate to matters of public nature relevant to the enquiry, though such judgments, orders or decrees are not conclusive proof of that which they state. Section 43 says judgments other than those mentioned in Sections 40-42 are irrelevant unless the existence of a judgment order or decree is a fact in issue or is relevant under some other provisions of this Act. The judgments which do not fall within the purview of Sections 40-42 can only be admitted under Section 43 if the existence of such judgment is a fact in issue in a case. If there is no fact in issue involved then such judgments has to come within the last portion of Section 43 i.e., they are relevant under some other provisions of this Act. The question is whether judgments not inter partes can be made relevant under this Section 13 or not.

In Nityamatali v. Gurudas,[20] it was held that the word transaction in Section 13 included judgments which though not conclusive, would still be admissible as evidence for what they are worth, even when they might not be admissible under Sections 40-43.

But in Gujju Lall v. Fattehlall,[21] the majority view was that the judgment was not a 'fact' within the meaning of Section 11, nor a 'transaction' within the meaning of Section 13 of this Act; that if a judgment were admissible under either of this section as a fact or as a transaction, the other provisions in Sections 40-42 would be unnecessary.[22]

But in view of subsequent pronouncements of the Judicial Committee, under certain circumstances, in certain cases, the judgment in a previous suit, to which one of the parties in a subsequent suit was not a party, may be admissible in evidence for certain purposes and with certain objects in the subsequent suit.[23]

Ramranjan Chukerbutty v. Ram Narain Singh[24] is an extreme case where it was held that a decree eighty years old dismissing a suit on the ground that the defendants had mokurari tenure was admitted as cogent evidence of their ancient possession, of the rate of rent paid, and of their title having been long ago asserted successfully. In Dinomoni Chowdhrani v. Brojo Mohini[25], the Privy Council held that: Police orders made under the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code to prevent breaches of the peace, in cases of dispute as to immovable property were admissible in evidence on general principles as well as under this section to show the fact that such orders were made. They observed: "This necessarily makes them evidence of the following facts all of which appear from the orders themselves, viz., who the parties to the dispute were; what the land in dispute was; and who was declared entitled to retain possession. For this purpose and to this extent such orders are admissible in evidence for and against everyone when the fact of possession at the date of the order has to be ascertained."

In Gobinda Narayan v. Shyam Lal,[26] the Privy Council observed at page 136 with reference to a judgment in a previous suit in which an estate called Pandra Estate was held partible in a subsequent adjudication not inter partes.

"They think that the judgment in question is only admissible under the provisions of Sections 13 and 43 of the Evidence Act as establishing a particular transaction in which the partibility of the Pandra Estate was asserted and recognized—namely, the partition resulting from the 1793 suit. The reasons upon which the judgment is founded are not part of the transaction and cannot be regarded, nor can any finding of fact there come to, other than the transaction itself, be relevant in the present case. The judgment, therefore, is no evidence that Thakur Sib Singh got the Achra villages by partition; it is at most evidence that he might have done so, and this is plainly not sufficient." In Bitto Kunwar v. Kesho Prasad,[27] the Privy Council held that though a decision in an earlier suit was not binding on a person who was not a party it was admissible in evidence against him. In that case the earlier decision was to the effect that a will was revoked. The Privy Council however did not refer to any section of the Evidence Act.

In Srinivas Krishna Rao Kango v. Narayan Devji Kango,[28] the Supreme Court had to consider the admissibility of judgments in prior suits for maintenance, where the widow asserted that the properties in dispute were joint family properties, in a subsequent suit by her adopted son claiming partition on the ground that they are joint family properties. The Supreme Court held that the judgment was admissible under Section 13. It observed: "The argument of the appellant is that these judgments are admissible under Section 13 of the Evidence Act, as instances in which there was an assertion that the suit properties belonged to the joint family. For the respondents, it is contended that the dispute between the parties in those litigations was only about the quantum of maintenance to be awarded, that no question of title to the properties was directly involved, and that Section 13 was inapplicable. We are unable to accept this contention. The amount of maintenance to be awarded would depend on the extent of the joint family properties, and an issue was actually framed on that question. Moreover there was a prayer that the maintenance should be charged on the family properties, and the same was granted. We are of opinion that the judgments are admissible under Section 13 of the Evidence Act as assertions of Rukminibai that the properties now in dispute belonged to the joint family.

In Sital Das v. Santram,[29] the Supreme Court held that in a suit where succession to the office of a Mahant was in dispute, the previous judgment in which the deceased Mahant challenged certain alienations, was admissible as a transaction in which he asserted his right as a Mahant and on that footing got a decree.

The Supreme Court after referring to the provisions of Sections 40 to 43 observed: "It is apparent that Section 43 enacts that judgments other than those falling under Sections 40 to 42 are irrelevant unless they fall under some other provision of the Evidence Act; and, even if they do fall under any such other provision, all that is relevant, under Section 43 of the Evidence Act, is "the existence" of such judgment, order, or decree provided it "is a fact in issue, or is relevant under some other provision of this Act."[30] An obvious instance of such other provision is a judgment falling under Section 13, of the Evidence Act. The Illustration to Section 13, of the Evidence Act, indicates the kind of facts on which the existence of judgments may be relevant.

In Special Land Acquisition Officer, Bombay v. Lakhamsi Ghelabhai,[31] SHEAT J. held that judgments not inter partes, relating to land acquired are not admissible merely because the land dealt with in the judgment was situated near the land of which the value is to be determined. It was held there that such judgments would fall neither under Section 11 nor under Section 13 of the Evidence Act. Questions relating to value of particular pieces of land depend upon the evidence in the particular case in which those facts are proved. They embody findings or opinions relating to facts in issue and investigated in different cases. The existence of a judgment would not prove the value of some piece of land not dealt with at all in the judgment admitted in evidence. Even slight differences in situation can, sometimes, cause considerable differences in value. We do not think it necessary to take so restrictive a view of the provisions of Sections 11 and 13 of the Evidence Act as to exclude such judgments altogether from evidence even when good grounds are made out for their admission. In Khaja Fizuddin v. State of Andhra Pradesh,[32] a bench of three judges of the Supreme Court held such judgments to be relevant if they relate to similarly situated properties and contain determinations of value on dates fairly proximate to the relevant date in a case.

However in State of Bihar v. Sri Radhakrishna Singh,[33] the Supreme Court observed at page 710 (para 121): "Some Courts have used Section 13 to prove the admissibility of a judgment as coming under the provisions of Section 43, referred to above. We are, however, of the opinion that where there is a specific provision covering the admissibility of a document, it is not open to the court to call into aid other general provisions in order to make a particular document admissible. In other words if a judgment is not admissible as not falling within the ambit of Sections 40 to 42, it must fulfil the conditions of Section 43 otherwise it cannot be relevant under Section 13 of the Evidence Act. The words "other provisions of this Act" cannot cover secton 13 because this section does not deal with judgments at all.

They referred to number of decisions under Section 13 and ultimately came to the conclusion (para 133, page 712) that the cumulative effect is that a judgment not inter partes is inadmissible in evidence except for the limited purpose of proving as to who the parties were, what was the decree passed, and the properties which were the subject-matter of the suit and it is not admissible to support the title and relationship. The above conclusion is no doubt supported by most of the decisions in Section 13 though as stated earlier in some of the decisions the Privy Council and the Supreme Court went further. For example in 22 I.A. 60 a previous judgment was held admissible to prove the rent paid or the fact of possession. In 1954 S.C.J. 408 it was held admissible to prove the nature of the property as joint family property. In AIR 1976 SC 2403 it was held that judgments were admissible to prove the value of the properties acquired which was the subject-matter of the later suit. But the observations of the Supreme Court in AIR 1983 SC 684 that if a judgment is not admissible under Sections 40 to 42 it must fulfil the conditions of Section 43 that otherwise it can not be relevant under Section 13 as the words "Other provisions of the Act cannot cover Section 13 because the section does not deal with judgments at all, are not justified. It is clear from the decisions referred to above the Privy Council and the Supreme Court considered judgements admissible as transactions even though they do not come within Sections 40 to 43. In Particular in AIR 1976 SC 2413, it is categorically stated that an obvious instance of other provisions in Section 43 is a judgment under Section 13. It is surprising that the Supreme Court in AIR 1983 SC 684 did not refer to a number of decisions of the Privy Council and Supreme Court referred to above and in particular to para 26 in AIR 1976 SC 2403 at 2413.

Judgments in a previous case not inter partes are not admissible to prove the truth of the matters decided in that judgment. The finding of fact arrived at on the evidence in one case are not evidence of that fact in another case.[34]

Judgments not inter partes might be admissible in evidence as establishing a particular transaction, if any, by which the relevant right was asserted, recognised, claimed or denied, but in no case the reasons and the findings of fact arrived at in them would be admissible in evidence.[35]

In the case of an adjudication not inter partes its existence alone is admissible under Section 43, and only in cases where such existence is relevant. Its correctness or incorrectness is not admissible, nor are the reasons on which it is based. Although judgment (i.e., an adjudication) in a proceeding A v. B may perhaps be used in a subsequent proceeding A and B v. C as evidence that there was a decision on a certain point, it cannot be used as evidence that there was an accurate decision based on true facts.[36]

So far as regards the truth of the matter decided, a judgment is not admissible evidence against one who is a stranger to the suit. In a suit for possession of land a judgment in a previous suit, though admissible as evidence of assertion of a right to the land, is not evidence of the right as against a stranger.[37]

"It may be taken to be fairly settled that the judgment in a previous suit though not inter partes is admissible in proof of a transaction or a particular instance in which the relationship was asserted and recognised or denied. A judgment in the previous suit though not conclusive is admissible in evidence like any other fact to be weighed in the balance. It is not the correctness of the previous decision but the fact that there has been a previous decision that is established by the judgment."[38]

A judgment, not inter partes, and mentioning a fact not relevant in that case, is inadmissible in evidence to prove that fact in a subsequent case. Thus the previous decision not inter partes, in which it was mentioned that N took F in adoption, when the fact of adoption was not relevant in that case is inadmissible to prove F's adoption to N in a subsequent case.[39]

In Nataraj Pillai v. Subbaraya,[40] it was held that a judgment by the French Court deciding that an adoption by a Hindu widow domiciled in French India was one which could validly be made under French Law and that it was made in such manner as French Law required for its validity, though not binding on courts in India, is admissible in evidence under Section 13, Evidence Act, even if it is not between the parties. Weight to be given to it depends on all the circumstances.

(In the circumstances of the case, it was held that the judgment in question must be given great weight in respect of all the matters dealt with by it.)

Where in a suit certain properties were claimed as self-acquired properties, a judgment in a previous litigation whereunder a lady in the family claimed maintenance on the ground that the properties are of joint family and when the court awarded the maintenance and created a charge on those properties, it was held admissible, on the ground that there on assertion of right of maintenance against the joint family property was recognised.[41]

In another case the Supreme Court held that the previous judgment in a suit by a former Mahant can be received in evidence under Section 13 in a suit where the succession to the office of a Mahant is in dispute, on the ground that the previous judgment based a transaction in which a person from whom one of the parties purported to derive his title ascerted his right as a spiritual collateral of the former Mahant and got a decree.[42]

The judgment of a court is a document which usually contains both a description of the litigation and the adjudication, with the reasons for the adjudication. The narrative given in a judgment not inter partes of the nature of the litigation, the names of the parties and witnesses, the rival assertions or claims, and the character of the evidence oral and documentary is admissible under Section 35 to prove those facts, if relevant under this or any other section. The court's written judgment is often the most convenient means of proof, and, in the case of an old proceeding, sometimes the only available proof of these matters. Thus a statement in a decree that a certain pedigree table had been put in evidence by one of the parties was admitted in evidence of that under Section 35 in a subsequent suit between other parties.[43]

In a suit for eviction against A, B, C, D, on the basis of a prior decree for ejectment obtained only against A, B, C, who was the brother of A and B, and D who was the wife of C, contended that the previous decree was not binding on them. It was held that the decision in the previous suit may not be res judicata against C and D, but it was good evidence of the fact that the plaintiff got a declaration of his rights, as against A and B; that C and D being merely in occupation at the instance of A and B or as members or dependents of the family they could not claim any better right to question the validity of the decree in the earlier suit.[44]

Where the previous judgment was of a Maharaj Sabha not being inter partes which gave a decision that the adoption of one F was not relevant in that case, it was held that such decision is inadmissible to prove adoption of F.[45]

14. JUDGEMENTS IN CRIMINAL CASES

A previous judgment in a criminal case is relevant in a civil suit as evidence of a particular instance where the right was claimed.[46]

A criminal court's judgment is admissible in evidence in a civil suit for a limited purpose of establishing a fact that the prosecution had ended in plaintiff's favour and not for the purpose of ascertaining the grounds on which the judgment was pronounced. It is well settled that the proceedings in a criminal court are not evidence in a suit for malicious prosecution and the civil court, must go into the evidence and decide.[47]

In deciding a suit for damages arising from a malicious prosecution, the judge treated the judgment of the magistrate and the evidence given before the magistrate, in the prosecution complained of, as evidence in the case. Looking at the judgment of the magistrate as being a record of the facts found, the judge came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was not present at the time when the alleged offence was committed and decreed the plaintiff's claim. On appeal, it was held that it was not permissible to the judge to utilise the judgment of the magistrate in the way he did; and that Sections 43, 13 or 11 of the Evidence Act did not apply to the case.[48]

15. FINDING OF FACTS IN A JUDGMENT

Where the two parties claimed possession of a house in dispute and which led to a criminal proceedings between those parties, a judgments of a Civil Court was relied on by a sessions judge when a second appeal was pending against that judgment. According to the judgment one party was shown as in possession of the house, and so the accused was convicted. It was held, that the provisions of Sections 40-42 and 43 only excluded judgments as pieces of conclusive evidence, but did not bar the admission of judgments as proof of the fact of litigation or its results and effect upon the parties which made a certain course of conduct probable or improbable on the part of one of the parties.[49]

Where a tenant filed a petition for fixing the standard and reduce the contractual rent and when he sought to produce findings in other cases in support of his petition, it was held that finding of fact in one case is no evidence of that fact in another case. And therefore, certified copies of judgments in other standardisation cases cannot be filed, but if parties do not object and adopt such statements as correct the court may proceed on that basis.[50]

16. IN LAND ACQUISITION CASES

Judgments in other land acquisition proceedings are relevant in considering the market value of the land in subsequent acquisition cases.[51]

17. EX PARTE JUDGMENT

It was held by the Punjab High Court, that an ex parte judgment of a High Court, where it is an instance of custom or opinion on a question of law does not become less valuable merely on the ground of the absence of a respondent.[52]

In an uncontested case where a custom was alleged to exist it was held to be very good proof of the existence of the alleged custom.[53]

19. DECREE AS TO POSSESSION

A decree as to possession of land is admissible under this section as it affords presumptive proof of possession in favour of decree holder.[54]

20. JUDGMENTS ON COMPROMISE BETWEEN PARTIES

A compromise between two parties cannot bind a person to which he was not a party, but it cannot be said that it has no evidentiary value, it can be admitted under this section, and can be taken into consideration by the courts as evidence of the conduct of the parties at that time.[55]

Where after the decision of the Court in a litigation there was compromise between the parties, the compromise deprives the decision of much of its evidentiary value.[56]

21. DOCUMENTS NOT INTER PARTIES

The Supreme Court in Harihar Prasad v. Deonarain Prasad,[57] held that the description in a mortgage deed by the mortgagors of the land mortgaged as properties "In our Sir, and Khas possession" may not be regarded as admissions by the mortgagees as the deeds were executed by the mortgagors; but they are certainly admissible under Section 13 as assertions of title and when it is under these documents that the mortgagees claimed, their probative value as against them, and as against their lessees who claimed under them is high.

Recitals of boundaries in documents not inter parties would be admissible under this section in proper cases where the circumstances of particular case permit such a course. The recitals as to a boundary in documents between third parties is admissible to prove possession or title as against a stranger.[58] Where a muchilika was executed by a tenant in favour of a land-lord describing the land-lord as an adopted son of one D, in the descriptive portion of the document, it was held that the description of the land-lord as the adopted son of D was not a superfluous recital, but it was in assertion of right that the tenant was taking the lease of the land which the land-lord could lease out as the adopted son of D, and so it is admissible.[59] The recitals as to the character of the lands in dispute made in mortgage bonds executed by the plaintiff are admissible in evidence under this section.[60] In a mortgage deed executed by A and B, it was stated that B was the adopted son of his deceased brother C. It was held that admission of A is relevant under Section 32 clause 3 being against his pecuniary interests inasmuch as he would lose his share in the property of C if B was his adopted son; it also constituted evidence of B's assertion of the right that he was adopted son of C and was relevant under Section 13 read with Section 32 clause 7 as B was dead.[61]

In the case of a statement of a third party made in a document executed in favour of the defendant in a suit, about the boundaries of the land concerned in a suit, when such third party was not proved to be dead nor was he examined in the case, it was held that such statement in a document is inadmissible against the plaintiff.[62] The recitals of the boundaries in documents between third parties are inadmissible to show that any party to the suit is or is not the owner of an adjoining land which has been mentioned as one of the boundaries in such documents[63] unless the executant is examined.[64] Similarly documents between a party to the suit and a stranger in which there were recitals as to the boundary is not admissible.[65]

In the case or recitals of boundaries in document inter parties, it would be a joint statement made by the parties to the document, and so it is relevant against them as an admission. Where the recitals occur in a document between a party and a stranger it would be relevant against the party as an admission but not admissible in his favour. Where the recital is in a document between strangers, it is not a particular instance which the right was claimed, recognised or exercised or a transaction by which a right was claimed or asserted within the meaning of Section 13, and hence they are inadmissible to show that any party to the suit is or is not the owner of the adjoining land which has been mentioned as one of the boundaries in such documents.[66]

A document not inter parties is not relevant under this section but if the executant of the document is examined as a witness the recitals contained therein may be used to corroborate his testimony under Section 157.[67] Where there is statement in a rent receipt issued by a land-lord in favour of the plaintiff in the suit describing the plaintiff as daughter of the deceased tenant, it was held that it is not admissible as the land-lord was not examined though alive.[68]

22. RECORD OF RIGHTS

Under the Santhal Parganas Settlements Regulation of 1872, it was held that the record of rights maintained under the said regulation is conclusive as to the character of the land and not as to the nature of title.[69]

23. ENQUIRY UNDER BENGAL REGULATION

A report, submitted by a local agent under Bengal Regulation 19 of 1810 in an enquiry made by him as to whether a particular temple is a private or public temple, is admissible under this section when the nature of the temple, is in question.[70]

24. INAM FAIR REGISTER

It was held by the Andhra Pradesh High Court, following a decision of the Madras High Court, in Sherfuddin v. Kairoon Bi,[71] that the Inam Fair Register is entitled to great weight as the preparation of Inam Register was a great Act of State and its preparation and contents were the subject of much consideration under elaborately detailed reports and minutes but that is not to say that the entries therein would override or nullify the effect of registers prepared long before; that it is only in the absence of authentic evidence that utmost importance will be given to the Inam Fair Register. But it will not displace earlier documents the authenticity of which could not be questioned.[72]

25. PRIVATE MAPS

Private maps are not admissible in evidence until their accuracy has been proved. But where a private map or plan is attached to or referred to in a document of title relating to property in suit and such map is a part of the document and is necessary to understand or explain the document, it is admissible in evidence under Section 13 to render the document itself intelligible.[73]

26. "BY WHICH"

In this section the expression 'any transaction by which' is used, and not 'any transaction in which'.

SESHAGIRI IYER, J. in Saripalli v. Fota,[74] and also GEIDT. J., in Bansi Singh v. Mirali Amirali,[75] held that the stress should be laid on the use of the word 'by'.

By using the expression 'by which' along with the expression 'transaction' it was held that in order that the transaction should be admissible on the ground that the right was created, claimed, modified, asserted, or denied, it must be shown to be not apart from the transaction by which it was created, claimed etc.[76]

27. ASSERTED

In a case[77] one plaintiff filed a suit for recovery of possession with an alternative prayer for fixing a fair and equitable rent. The defendant claimed that the land is a rent free Fakirana Grant and filed two documents, a Patta of 1905 and a sale deed in favour of his predecessor in interest. The Madras High Court, after considering the decisions of other High Courts held that the recital in those two documents that the land was a rent free Fakirana Grant was admissible in evidence, on the ground that the claim was asserted and recognised in those two documents.[78]

It was held in Rangayyan's case that where the existence of a right is in question it is permissible for the party relying on its existence to prove any transaction by which it was recognised by means of recitals of boundaries in document not inter partes.

The word 'assertion' in Clause 'b' of this section includes both a statement and enforcement by an act. It is not necessary to place evidence of acts done. A verbal statement not amounting to and not accompanied by any act would also be admissible if it amounts to a 'claim'.[79]

In a suit for declaration that the plaintiff was not married to the defendant, a report of the Government handwriting expert in a criminal case arising out of a complaint by the plaintiff's father for the alleged forgery of a marriage certificate was filed into the court, it was held that the report could be used as a evidence in the suit, on the ground that a particular fact was asserted and denied in the criminal case.[80]

28. "CLAIMED"

The word 'claim' denotes a demand or assertion in relation to a thing or attribute as against, or from, some person or persons showing the existence of a right to it in the claiment.[81]

In another case it was held that the word 'claim' implies that a right is asserted to the knowledge and in the presence of a person whose right will be derogated from by the establishment of the claim. The mere assertion of the right in a document to which the person against whom the right is asserted, is not a party and of which he knows nothing, is not to claim the right.[82]

In a suit a widow claimed that her husband died in 1939, whereas others contended that he died in 1933, the court found that the husband of the widow died in 1939. In a subsequent suit that judgment was filed to prove that the widow's husband died in 1939. It was held that a judgment other than a judgment referred to in Sections 40 to 42 may be admissible to prove that a right was asserted or denied under Section 13 or to explain or to introduce facts in issue or to explain the history of the case, that the finding in regard to the date of widow's husband's death could not be held as altogether inadmissible in law, the court could accept it atleast as an instance of the fact that the right was claimed and asserted and finally recognised in the previous suit, that hence the prior judgment though not admissible under Sections 40-42, was not barred from admissibility under Section 13.[83]

29. "RECOGNIZED"

Judicial recognition of a custom is relevant under this section as an instance of the custom being recognised.[84]

But a judicial decision is far from having the same importance as a clear-cut instance of custom recognised by the parties themselves.[85]

Facts showing existence of state of mind, or of body, or bodily feeling.

S. 14. Facts showing the existence of any state of mind, such as intention, knowledge, good faith, negligence, rashness, ill-will or good-will towards any particular person, or showing the existence of any state of body or bodily feeling, are relevant, when the existence of any such state of mind or body or bodily feeling is in issue, or relevant.

Explanation* 1.—A fact relevant as showing the existence of a relevant state of mind must show that the state of mind exists, not generally, but in reference to the particular matter in question.

Explanation* 2.—But where, upon the trial of a person accused of an offence, the previous commission by the accused of an offence is relevant within the meaning of this section, the previous conviction of such person shall also be a relevant fact.

(a) A is accused of receiving stolen goods knowing them to be stolen. It is proved that he was in possession of a particular stolen article.

The fact that, at the same time, he was in possession of many other stolen articles is relevant, as tending to show that he knew each and all of the articles of which he was in possession to be stolen.

(b) A is accused of fraudulently delivering to another person a counterfeit coin which, at the time when he delivered it, he knew to be counterfeit.

The fact that, at the time of its delivery, A was possessed of a number of other pieces of counterfeit coin is relevant.

The fact that A had been previously convicted of delivering to another person as genuine a counterfeit coin knowing it to be counterfeit is relevant.

(c) A sues B for damage done by a dog of B's, which B knew to be ferocious.

The facts that the dog had previously bitten X, Y and Z, and that they had made complaints to B, are relevant.

(d) The question is, whether A, the acceptor of a bill of exchange, knew that the name of the payee was fictitious.

The fact that A had accepted other bills drawn in the same manner before they could have been transmitted to him by the payee if the payee had been a real person, is relevant as showing that A knew that the payee was a fictitious person.

(e) A is accused of defaming B by publishing an imputation intended to harm the reputation of B.

The fact of previous publications by A respecting B, showing ill-will on the part of A towards B is relevant as proving A's intention to harm B's reputation by the particular publication in question.

The facts that there was no previous quarrel between A and B, and that A repeated the matter complained of as he heard it, are relevant, as showing that A did not intend to harm the reputation of B.

(f) A is sued by B for fraudulently representing to B that C was solvent, whereby B, being induced to trust C, who was insolvent, suffered loss.

The fact that at the time when A represented C to be solvent, C was supposed to be solvent by his neighbours and by persons dealing with him, is relevant, as showing that A made the representation in good faith.

84. Janat Bibi v. Ghulam Hussain, AIR 1934 Lah 861 : (1934) 16 Lah 307.
85. Dewan Singh v. Santi, ILR (1936)17 Lah 809 : AIR 1937 Lah 228.

(g) A is sued by B for the price of work done by B, upon a house of which A is owner, by the order of C, a contractor.

A's defence is that B's contract was with C.

The fact that A paid C for the work in question is relevant, as proving that A did, in good faith, make over to C the management of the work in question, so that C was in a position to contract with B on C's own account, and not as agent for A.

(h) A is accused of the dishonest misappropriation of property which he had found, and the question is whether, when he appropriated it, he believed in good faith that the real owner could not be found.

The fact that public notice of the loss of the property had been given in the place where A was, is relevant, as showing that A did not in good faith believe that the real owner of the property could not be found.

The fact that A knew, or had reason to believe, that the notice was given fraudulently by C, who had heard of the loss of the property and wished to set up a false claim to it, is relevant as showing that the fact that A knew of the notice did not disprove A's good faith.
